Hans Heiling's Rocks.

CONTINUED.

Elizabeth hid her glowing face in her hands while Arnold repeated his last words in a melancholy and imploring tone.

At last the beautiful girl raised her tearful features towards the anxious youth, and said with deep earnestness: "Arnold, I am yours—I have ever loved you!"

The youth pressed the maiden once more to his beating heart, and sealed with a passionate embrace the confession of love.

CHAP. II.

Next morning, while Elizabeth was preparing her father's breakfast, the old man began to talk about Arnold. "I feel a sort of pity for the poor lad," said he "You must remember him, I think, Elizabeth, for many a day you have played together when you were young?"

"Remember Arnold," stammered Elizabeth, blushing deeply, "why should I not?"

"You might have reason to be ashamed were it otherwise," resumed Veit: "for though his father continued poor while we got rich, he was always an honest man, and I hear that his son treads in his steps."

"Really, father," interrupted Elizabeth somewhat hastily, "I believe Arnold is a very deserving young man."

"And pray where have you learned that with so much certainty?" inquired the father.

"They say so in the village," faltered Elizabeth.

"I am glad to hear it," replied old Veit. "If I can assist the lad in any way, I shall be happy to do it."

CHAP. III.

Before the shadows of the dial told that mid-day was come, Arnold and Elizabeth met each other by appointment in the garden behind Veit's house. With joy Elizabeth recounted the conversation which she had had with her father in the morning, and the two lovers agreed in putting that construction upon the old man's words which they were most anxious they should bear. "Yes!" exclaimed the transported youth, who now beheld himself on the point of realizing his most ardent wishes—"Yes! I will go to your father this very evening; I will tell him all, and demand his consent. And then I will take my departure with a light heart; and having amassed a competence for my beloved Elizabeth in the exercise of my art in richer countries, I will return and claim her promised hand."

In the evening Arnold, equipped in his best attire, knocked with a beating heart at neighbor Veit's door, and was ushered into the presence of her father by Elizabeth herself. In a few words the youth explained his intentions, and concluded by demanding the old man's promise, that if at the end of three years he should return home with a little property, sufficient at least to provide comfortably for Elizabeth, he should be received as his son-in-law, and that in the mean time Elizabeth should be regarded as his affianced bride. But what words can express the poor youth's disappointment when, after commending his discretion and honorable intentions, old Veit coolly told him that the idea of obtaining his consent to his daughter's betrothal under present circumstances, was utterly wild and impracticable! "You may return if you choose," added the old man, "at the expiry of the period you mention; and if Elizabeth is still unmarried and disengaged, and if your fortune should be reasonably proportioned to hers, then I will not oppose your union; but I shall certainly never be so much wanting in my duty to my child as to refuse any reasonable proposals merely because there is a possibility of your return."

"And is this your final resolve?" inquired Arnold with a look of unspeakable earnestness.

"It is," rejoined the other calmly. "Then God help me!" exclaimed the youth, rushing out of the house in phrenzied despair.

Elizabeth had overheard the conversation betwixt her father and Arnold, and with him had felt the fairest hopes of life blasted in one brief hour. She now stepped gently out of the house and followed her lover, who directed his steps towards the church-yard, with the design of once more watering the cold turf which covered his father's remains with his tears before he set out on a long and uncertain pilgrimage.

The youth was bending over the grave when Elizabeth approached. "Arnold! Arnold!" she exclaimed, flinging her arms around his neck; "Oh it must not, cannot be, my Arnold! We part not thus!"

"Elizabeth, I must! Forbear! You break my heart—but I must go!"

"And will my Arnold never return again?"

"Elizabeth, I will do all that man can do in my circumstances. Every moment of my time will I devote to that purpose for which alone I now live. Within three years will I return, if the grave has not closed over me ere they elapse. Will you continue true to me?"

"True till death!" replied Elizabeth firmly.

"Even though your father should strive to compel you?"

"Even though they should drag me to the altar!"

"Then part we now in hope! Elizabeth, at the end of three years thou art mine! Till then, farewell!"

Arnold stooped and imprinted a kiss on the weeping maiden's forehead; then tore himself from her arms, and plunged into the darkness of the night.

CHAP. IV.

Early every morning Elizabeth visited the spot where she had last parted with Arnold, and her father chided her not for so doing, because he reckoned it only a girlish fancy which would soon be lost sight of when a new object presented itself to her imagination. A year had passed away in this manner, and greatly to Elizabeth's satisfaction, no new suitor had yet announced himself. But towards the end of the second year, a person who had left the village in extreme indigence in early life, returned in very opulent circumstances. Hans Heiling, as he was called, had travelled, or affirmed that he had done so, through a great many countries; and in addition to his apparently limitless wealth, he possessed an inexhaustible store of anecdotes and marvellous narratives, which so endeared him to old Veit, that every evening seemed to him unsupportably tedious if Hans did not spend some hours of it by his fireside. The neighbours indeed shook their heads at many of Hans's relations; and there was also something unaccountably mysterious in his disappearance every Friday; but Veit was upon the whole so well satisfied with his new neighbor, that when he made formal proposals to him for his daughter's hand, he intimated that if he could make himself agreeable to the girl herself, he had no objections to the match. As for Elizabeth, she, as may well be supposed, hated the very sound of his name; and at his approach her blood seemed to herself to freeze within her veins. Hans Heiling was the only one of God's creatures whom she detested—the only human being in whose presence she felt unhappy.

Elizabeth was seated at her spinning-wheel before the door of the house, one fine summer-evening, when Hans suddenly presented himself before her. The girl trembled as she stood up to inform him that her father was not within the house, and shrunk with horror from him when he sat down beside her, and seized her by the hand.

TELEGRAPHIC.

Washington, Sept 2—Among the papers captured at Hatteras, was one from the late Consul at Rio de Janeiro, giving a description of the vessels leaving or to leave with cargoes. Six of these vessels were captured by privateers.

The Harriet Lane got ashore at Hatteras, and threw over her guns and coal.

Wheeling, Sept 2—There is great excitement to-night, owing to a dispatch from Fairmount which reports that the secessionists of the back counties are rising and marching on the town to burn it, and tear up the railroad.

The rising is supposed to be in concert with some movement of Lee.

Quincy, Ill., Sept 2—There is great excitement here owing to an apprehended attack from Missouri.

St. Joseph, Sept 2—110 mounted Missourians paraded through the town and captured two Federal recruiting officers.

New Orleans, September 2.—Congress adjourned yesterday at midnight, until the third Monday of November unless convened by the President.

The annexed acts were approved by the President and made public:

An act establishing the rates of postage on newspapers and periodicals sent to dealers through the mails or express. The rates are the same as those paid by regular subscribers.

An Act establishing the rates of postage on newspapers and periodicals sent to dealers through the mails or express. The rates are the same as those paid by regular subscribers.

An Act requiring Post-masters to receive Treasury notes in the sum of $5 and upwards for stamps and stamped envelopes.

An Act for the sequestration of the estates, property and effects of alien enemies, and for the indemnity of the citizens of the Confederate States and persons aiding the same in the existing war.

The preamble of the Act says: Whereas, the Government of the peoples of U. S., have departed from the usages of civilized warfare in confiscating and destroying the property of the people of the C. S., of all kinds, whether used for military purposes or not; and whereas, our only protection against such wrongs, is to be found in such measures as indemnify our own citizens for them, and restrain the wanton exercises of the enemy.

A resolution was approved directing the Secretary of War, whenever practicable, to supply the troops with well baked bread, also with rations of fresh vegetables when the latter can be obtained at reasonable cost.

An act authorizing the appointment by the President of persons from civil life to the staff of Generals who are recommended by Generals.

An act providing for the appointment by the President, of Adjutants of Regiments or portions of them, upon the recommendation of the Col. thereof.

An act requiring the Secretary of War to receive and forward clothes, shoes, blankets and other articles of necessity sent to the army by private contributions.

An act allowing Chaplains in the army the same rations as privates.

New York, Sept. 2.—The Surveyor has seized twenty-eight vessels owned in whole or in part in the South.

Washington, Sept. 2.—The Post says that the pickets are closing. There are many exciting rumors, some saying that the Confederates had crossed at Aquia Creek.

Louisville, Sept. 2.—There is nothing in the Eastern reports but glorification over Hatteras.

Butler says that "Hatteras light may again send forth its cheering ray to the storm-beaten mariner."

A new Department is to be created for Butler.
