CROSS-EYED MATRIMONY.

THE TROUBLE OF A PAIR CURVED WITH OBLIQUE VISION.

Philadelphia Sunday Mercury, The union of a cross-eyed man with an oblique-eyed woman is attended with one very discouraging feature—neither can see straight.

When Samuel Berryman went hunting a wife he soon discovered that the cross-eyed man was not a popular favorite with straight-eyed girls. After vainly trying to capture several girls he madly admired, he contented himself with courting a girl who admired him. In the latter case he found his wooing easy and the offer of marriage was snatched up as soon as it was uttered.

Berryman was cross-eyed and his bride was likewise. This gave the latter the opportunity of explaining to her friends that it was sympathy and not love that induced her to become Mrs. Berryman. Being afflicted with an obliqueness of vision her heart naturally went out to the man for whom she could feel. Immediately upon their marriage the young couple went direct to housekeeping and for a week things went on swimmingly. At the end of that time the peculiar misfortune of each began causing trouble. It was in the left eye that the husband was left-handed, while the horrid squint of the wife proceeded from the right eye. Where the bedroom clock should be located was the question from which a difficulty originated. The husband claimed he couldn't see it if it was placed on the mantle and the wife persisted she could see it nowhere else. One night the husband, on retiring, placed it on a chair on the right side of the bed. When he awoke in the morning and struck a match to see the time the clock wasn't there. During the night the wife had arisen and replaced it on the mantle.

It was at the breakfast table that the difficulty began.

"I wish you would leave the clock where I placed it," said the husband.

"And I wish you would allow it to remain where I can see it," said the wife.

"But I can't see it when it is on the mantle."

"That isn't my fault."

"Now, there you go. You're making fun of me because I'm cross-eyed."

"I'm not. I never thought of such a thing."

"Then what made you move the clock? You know I'm cross-eyed and can't see it when it's on the mantle."

"And you know I'm cross-eyed and can't see well with my right eye."

"But you might have left the clock be."

"And you might have left it be. I'm sure if you loved your wife as you ought to you'd try to oblige her."

But don't you think it's a wife's duty to try and oblige her husband?"

"I do, when she can do it without obliging herself."

"Well, I want the clock where I can see it."

"And I want it where I can see it. We can't both have our way."

"I know we can't, and you might therefore allow me to have my way."

That was the first shot, and, as nothing more was said just then, the initial battle resulted in a draw. In the evening, however, the question was brought up, and amicably settled. At the husband's suggestion it was resolved that the clock difficulty should be quieted by suspending the time piece directly over the center of the bed by a cord from the ceiling.

Although the couple several times had words as to where the mirrors should be hung, no actual outbreak occurred until after they had been married a month. The husband, who was a careful and economical man, kept an account of the expenses, and, finding that they ran very close to the receipts, determined to have a talk with his wife and try to inaugurate a reign of economy.

Producing the family account book one evening he first requested his wife to give him her attention, and then began footing up the expenses. While reading each item aloud he looked up suddenly and noticed that instead of gazing at the book his wife's head was turned toward the wall.

"I do wish you would give me your attention," he said tartly.

"I'm giving you my attention," was the reply.

"You are not."

"I am."

"Why, you are not. I guess I can see."

"Oh, no, they weren't. They were turned toward the wall."

"They weren't?"

"They were. Your head was turned from me."

"I say they weren't. They were fixed directly upon the book."

"Oh, pahaw! What's the use of saying that. You haven't eyes in the back of your head."

"But your's might as well be for all the good they do you. I say I was following every move of your pencil."

"How could you be following every move of my pencil when your eyes were turned upon the wall?"

"Why, I guess you are so cross-eyed that you can't tell when I am looking straight."

"Cross-eyed! Me cross-eyed! Why, I can see straighter than you can. I don't have to turn the back of my head to a mirror when I want to see if my hat is on straight."

"Oh, no, of course not. You are even worse than that. One of your eyes has a lump in it and the other travels around like a circular saw."

"Don't make fun of my eyes."

"Then don't make fun of my eyes. They are a little crossed I know, but they ain't crooked enough to twist my nose out of shape."

"Do you mean to say that my eyes twist my nose out of shape?"

"Yes, I do."

"Well—never mind. I won't say what I was about saying. But I will say that if my eyes were as crooked as yours I would nix them out to trapeze performers in the circus."

"Oh, you horrid wretch. I won't live with you any longer." I will go home to my mother to-morrow."

"And then a burst of tears caused a cessation of hostilities and left both husband and wife feeling decidedly miserable."

When the morning came the wife did not go home to her ma. She was glum and moody, however, and the unhappy couple exchanged but few words. The following day passed with but little conversation, and no quarrel. In this this miserable condition the pair lived for a week. Both were anxious for a reconciliation, but each was too obstinate to make the first overtures.

At the end of the second week they began to be on speaking terms. One evening, while the husband was intently reading, his wife, draving a stool to his side, placed her head in his lap and burst into tears.

"Why, Mary, what are you crying about?"

Convulsive sobs was the answer.

"Mary, don't cry. Calm yourself and tell me what's troubling you."

"You don't love me!" sobbed the unhappy wife.

"Why, yes, I do. I love you dearly."

"Then what made you say my eyes were as crooked as a ram's horn?"

"Because you said mine were crooked enough to twist my nose out of shape. They ain't, are they?"

"No, they're real pretty eyes."

"And so are yours real pretty eyes."

"Now you're flatterin' me."

"I'm not. I mean every word I say. But Mary—" and here the husband suddenly paused.

"But what?"

"Why, this book I was to read is a treatise on the eyes."

Well, what does it say?"

"It says enough to encourage me in thinking that under the operation of a skillful surgeon our eyes could be made perfectly straight."

"Does it say all crossed eyes can be cured?"

"No, it doesn't say that. It says that some cases can."

"Well?"

"Why, I was thinking that perhaps it would be well for us to try to have our eyes straightened. Now what do you think?"

"You say every case can't be cured?"

"Not every case. But perhaps both your eyes and my eyes could be made perfectly straight."

"But isn't it possible that yours could be straightened and mine couldn't, or that my eyes could be cured and yours couldn't?"

"Yes."

"Then I'm opposed to any operation?"

"Why?"

"Because, dear," chirruped the wife, "because you might be cured, and I couldn't. Then you'd be a fine looking man with a horribly crossed-eyed wife. Then just imagine what people would say."

"Well, what would they say?"

"They'd say you were a fool for marrying such a hideous-looking woman."

"But suppose you were cured, and I wasn't?"

"Then they'd say I must have been hard-up for a husband to take such a looking sight as you."

"Then you oppose the idea of an operation on either your eyes or mine?"

"Yes. We're better as we are. You are cross-eyed and you know it; I am cross-eyed and I know it. Together we are as well matched as a pair of bolted horses. Now people pity us. If only one of us was cross-eyed the world would lose what little sympathy it has for us, and the straight-eyed one would probably grow to despise the other. No, no; let our eyes remain as they are. The fact that they are crooked is a bond of union between us."

"Correct," retorted the husband cheerfully. "And now that each has acknowledged to being cross-eyed, let's henceforth stop wrangling upon that subject! Never again let our cross eyes be the occasion for cross words."

Weakness Cured.

LYNN, MASS., Dec. 15, 1880.

I gave that valuable medicine, Brown's Iron Bitters, to my sister for weakness. After taking two bottles, she was able to walk and run as well as ever. It is certainly a wonderful tonic.

LOOK OUT FOR THE ROCKS.

A gentleman crossing the English channel stood near the helmsman. It was a calm and pleasant evening, and none dreamed of a possible danger to their good ship. But a sudden flapping of sail, as if the wind had shifted, caught the officer on watch and he sprang at once to the wheel, examining closely the compass.

"You are half a point off the course," he said sharply to the man at the wheel. The deviation was corrected, and the officer returned to his post.

"You must steer very accurately," said the looker-on, "when only half a point is so much thought of."

"Ah, half a point in many places might bring us directly on the rocks," he said.

So it is in life. Half a point from truthfulness strands us upon the rocks of falsehood; half a point from perfect honesty and we are steering right for the rocks of crime; and so of all kindred vices. The beginnings are always small. No one climbs a summit at one bound, but goes up one little step at a time. Children think lightly of what they call small things. These rocks do not look so fearful to them.

"It's no use," says the despondent dyspeptic. But it is of use. Your sufferings can be relieved; thousands have been cured, and you can also. Broken down, desponding victims of dyspepsia, liver complaint, fever and ague, rheumatism, nervous debility or premature decay, will find in Simmons' Liver Regulator, prepared by J. H. Zeila & Co., a vegetable specific which reaches the source of the trouble and effects an absolute and permanent cure. It regulates the liver, dispels despondency and restores health.

The highest hopes and interest of the race rest on the purity, health and strength of womanhood. We take pleasure in referring our readers to the remarkable efficacy of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound in all that class of diseases from which women suffer so much.

A Mormon Bishop, who claims the power of curing diseases by the laying on of hands, has had great success among a class of invalids who had not much the matter with them, and to whom imagination was much the same as medicine. When he tried his ecclesiastical hands on a balky horse, he made a lamentably conspicuous failure. The man who owned the horse had paid the Bishop three dollars, as the ecclesiastic would not make the attempt unless paid that price in advance. The laying of hands on the beast's head had the effect of frightening him and making him furious. So, from a balker, he suddenly changed to a kicker. Knocking the Bishop down the animal ran away, and as he ran, kicked to pieces the buggy which was fastened behind him. The Bishop's reputation in Salt Lake City as a healer of diseases does not stand as high as it did before he attempted that experiment in horse doctoring.

Health and strength given to delicate women, nursing mother and infant children who use Brown's Iron Bitters.

At Mr. George Henderson's to-morrow night, at 7 o'clock, a Twenty-five cent Mite Meeting will be held for the benefit of the Presbyterian Church. Friends are cordially invited.
