The other day a bright little baby arrived at a Marceline home. It was plump and good natured, but it was red-headed. This fact was seriously objected to by its sister, who was old enough to be prejudiced. "I don't like red hair and I am going to have it changed," she said. In a short time she appeared at Cater's drug store accompanied by another little girl. "Oh, doctor," said the disappointed child, "I like my little brover, but I does n't like red hair, won't you please change it, or make my little brover's hair black." The doctor explained as kindly as he could that it couldn't be done, the old stork was just out of little black-headed babies and so he had brought a red-headed one. "I tell you what doctor," said the other little girl, "if you'll get my friend a black headed baby I'll take this red-headed one—I think it's awful cute." The doctor has the case under advisement.—Marceline Journal.
