

LIQUOR POURS IN FROM NORTH AT RAPID RATE

Steady Flow From The Border — How It's Done

"See that bird in the big car?" inquired the native of the North Dakota town 50 miles or so from the Canadian border.

"Yes," replied stranger.

"Looks like a prosperous business man, doesn't he?" continued the native.

"He certainly does," acknowledged the visitor.

"Well he is," said the native, "but his business is running booze over the border. About 4 o'clock this afternoon he'll disappear. Then about 3 o'clock tomorrow morning he'll turn up again; you won't see him but he'll have two or three cases of Canadian whiskey on board."

Traffic General

Such is the traffic that the federal prohibition authorities are now trying to bring to an end in North Dakota, and other states lying along the border. It isn't confined to any one section of North Dakota, but is general all along the border, although the towns near the border of His Majesty's province of Saskatchewan, where the liquor regulations laws are less strict than in Manitoba have a certain advantage.

How They Work

Up to the present time the automobile has been the chief conveyance in the booze smuggling game. The bootlegger will leave the North Dakota town in which he operates late in the afternoon, so as to arrive at his Canadian "shipping point" as night is falling. The cargo is loaded and in the dead of the night the booze runner starts for the American border.

The border passed, the real excitement of the run begins. The booze runner knows every inch of the road between his cache on the Canadian side of the line, and his American destination. Therefore, he despises lights, and runs his machine at the top of its speed, which with the high powered cars mostly used is 50 to 60 miles per hour.

Game Sometimes Used

High powered rifles and revolvers are carried and there have been unofficial reports of clashes between law enforcement officers and liquor runners. On one occasion it is told how a booze runner shot both lights off his pursuer's car, and finally stopped him with well directed bullets through the radiator, the booze runner himself being able to run without lights, and so being shrouded by darkness from the return fire of the enforcement officer.

At one time during the summer it was known that between 15 and 20 runners were operating out of Fargo, alone, making a weekly profit for themselves and their assistants of close to $50,000. M. A. Hildreth, United States district attorney, said

CENTER OF POPULATION IN INDIANA

Hoosiers Nail The Spot Down To Make Sure Of It

New Center of Population of the U. S. (Maybe)—The census statisticians of the United States government can't get all of their data, regarding the next center of population of the country, in a scrap heap.

At least, as far as farmers in the vicinity of Bloomington, Ind., are concerned. It's a foregone conclusion to them as to where the next "center" will land. In fact, the backwoods farmers have spread it all over the eastern portion of Monroe county, Indiana—way up to the Brown county line.

In 1910 the "spot" was finally located at Bloomington. Now these farmer folks have discovered that the 1920 "spot" is likely to land somewhere within eight miles east of Bloomington. They were somewhat surprised that the "spot" should move eastward after having traveled about 85 miles west in the 1910 census, but already they are making their claims to the country at large.
