KINDNESS THE GUIDING PRINCIPLE

It is difficult for some of us to comprehend or understand the true mission of the funeral director. Even among members of the profession the vocation of caring for the human dead is measured by a standard in which the idea of barter is dominant. This conception is erroneous.

The true funeral director has nothing to sell. His mission transcends the idea of gain. Of the funeral director, more perhaps than of others, is kindness the guiding rule of success. The following is from the Christian Science Monitor:

"The observant Peter seems to have noticed the need of something more than austere righteousness, for he says 'Add to your * * * godliness brotherly kindness.' How great is the need in the world for ordinary kindness. We applaud kindness in the great emergencies, as when after the cruelty of battle the devoted nurses minister to the suffering, supplying their needs without asking on which side in the conflict they stood—just ministering to them all as to men in need of friendliness. But in the daily battle of life there are the wounded and broken-hearted. A smile gleaming from the face of a child has comforted one bereaved; the courtesy of a stranger has reassured a man almost discouraged; a pleasant word, a kind inquiry, a friendly look, a hearty greeting is often enough to redeem a man from loneliness and heart exile."
