REO Real Values are Real Values

If you are one of those who bought an automobile six months ago and now find its new value in the open market reduced by 25 to 33 cent by its own makers, while its second-hand value is less than half what you paid for it—then you probably wish you had obeyed that better impulse and bought a REO.

REO values are permanent values—because REO values are real values. REO used cars always command higher prices relatively than other cars that sell new at similar prices, while new REOs have season after season commanded premiums—because there are always more persons wanting REOs than there are REO cars to supply.

That condition obtains to-day to a greater extent than ever before—so that only those who appreciate it, and order early, can hope to get a REO in time for the summer touring season.
