THE PRESS.

CINCINNATI, FRIDAY, JUNE 24. HERMAN MAYVILLE.

Glenn, readily, warmly, Herman Mayville leaped over the vessel's side, and gazed into the calm, moonlit water beneath.

Downed down with the weight of a twofold sorrow, his fond hopes for the future blighted, the cup of happiness dashed from his lips ere they had touched it, and his life forever darkened—who had he to live for? And why should he live? Why drag out a dreary, aimless existence, tortured, continually, by the memory of the past? 'Twas an easy thing to die—

Yes, the ocean should be his grave! There would be a resting-place, and be freed from the sorrows of earth.

"Monsieur, where is mamma? Have you seen her?" 'Twas the voice of a child—sweet, clear, melodious.

Herman started and turned. Beside him stood a little girl, gazing in a robe of snowy whiteness, with a face spotted by fire of almost celestial beauty, softened and hallowed as it was by the moonlight.

Was it a being of the other world, sent to turn him from his purpose? To save him from the death he had meditated? He had believed it was yet, not the remembrance of his mother, and in French.

Addressing her, he said, in the same language, which we translate: "What is it, my child?"

"I can not find my mamma, Monsieur, and the large eyes filled with tears, and the little lips quivered.

Herman gently took her hand, and said, soothingly: "I will find your mamma, little one. But first tell me your name."

"Adine Bernadotti, Monsieur." "A sweet name. But it is Italian, petite; who do you call your mamma?"

"My mamma is French—where is she, Monsieur?" "Ah, I well might forget," began Herman, when, with a glad cry, and the exclamation: "There she is! there is my dear mamma!" she bounded from him, and was clasped in the arms of a pale, delicate, though beautiful woman, who, unperceived, had approached them.

Herman bowed. With a slight though graceful acknowledgment, she was passing on, when her daughter said, quickly— "I will find your mamma, little one. But first tell me your name."

not speak thus! My resolve is taken. In foreign lands I shall seek forgetfulness of my sorrow."

Marston knew that 'twould be useless to attempt further to dissuade him from his purpose, and seeing that the effort he was making to control his grief was painful, left him alone with his own sad thoughts.

True to his decision, Herman Mayville the next day bade farewell to his native land forever: 'Twas on the vessel in which he had taken passage that he met Adine Bernadotti. Ere they reached Havre, he had learned to love the little child, who in so singular a manner had been the means of saving him from death, with a strange and, to himself, incomprehensible devotion.

The mother, touched by his kindness to her daughter, told him the story of her own life.

Adeline Montmorenci was the only child of a French count, and had been reared in the lap of luxury. Her earliest recollections were of a chateau near Bordeaux, where she resided with her parents till she was fourteen, when her father died, leaving her an orphan.

Her mother, who was a widow, remained for four years, when Count Montmorenci died, leaving his wife and child a large unencumbered fortune. At this time Adeline was sixteen and strikingly beautiful. Her hand was sought by many, and ere she reached her nineteenth she had been betrothed to a young Italian noble, talented and handsome, but poor. For six years they enjoyed uninterrupted happiness, when he became addicted to dissipated habits and grossly neglected his wife and child.

The little Adeline, then two years old, Madame Montmorenci remembered the sorrowful day when she received a letter from a physician in New York, telling her that her husband, from whom she had not heard since she had left him, was dying, and besought her to forgive and come home.

All her old love revived when she knew that her husband was still living, and without hesitation she went to him, taking Adeline with her; she found him in great destitution and miserably ill. The first thing she did was to surround him with every comfort, and for six months she watched over him night and day, and at last she saw her arms blessing her for her goodness. She was now on her way home.

Herman, in return for her confidence, told his sad story, and felt comforted by her warm sympathy. As for Adeline, she had so entwined herself about his heart, that he dared not think of parting from her.

It was before him—where to choose? and he determined to go to Bordeaux and spend there his life, devoting himself to Adine.

Ten years have passed away. Herman Mayville is now thirty-four, in the prime and glory of his manhood. In ten weeks he will lead to the altar Adine Bernadotti, an enchanting maiden of twenty, and one of France's loveliest daughters. Beautiful as a poet's dream, she is the same guileless, loving child as when she talked with Herman in the moonlight, on the vessel's deck, so long ago.

Herman Mayville's early life, but as a troubled spirit, which he was to forget. His father died three years after he left his native land, and then he felt that the last tie which had bound him to it was severed, and he had now become a true and loyal son of France.

When Herman Mayville and Inez Engleton were married two months after Herman's abrupt departure, and are living at the Mayville Homestead, and have a family of four children.

Inez's hours of loneliness, when memory is busy with the past, she feels a pang of regret when she remembers her treacherous, dishonest lover, who, by his own fault, caused him to exile himself from his country, and became a wanderer upon the face of the earth.—N. Y. Ledger.

The Battle of Magenta—Reception of the News at Paris.

A Te Deum in honor of the victory of Magenta, was celebrated at Notre Dame, June 6. The Emperor and all the authorities were present.

Galligan's Messenger has the following on the celebration of the victory of Magenta in Paris and other French towns:

Placards announcing the victory were posted up every where in Paris, and the whole population received the intelligence with the greatest enthusiasm. At 7 in the evening the guns from the Invalides thundered forth a salvo in honor of the event; and at night the public offices, theaters, and a great number of private houses were illuminated.

The Emperor, with the Imperial Guard, between 9 and 10, went along the Boulevards and the Rue de Rivoli in an open carriage, and were everywhere greeted with the most enthusiastic cries of "Vive l'Empereur!"

"Vive l'Empereur!" "Vive la Princesse Clotilde!" The Emperor could only proceed at the very slowest walking pace, and the crowd which surrounded the Imperial carriage, the people were under the very wheels of the vehicle, and in their delight seemed quite regardless of their own safety. Her Majesty, who was in fact, a complete orator. The Boulevard was a magnificent thoroughfare were crowded to a late hour, and the city presented the appearance of a fest.

The news of the victory was immediately transmitted by the Minister of the Interior to all the Prefects of Departments. It was everywhere received with the most enthusiastic approval. All the dispatches received announce that the people were all as one; that the houses were immediately dressed out with flags, and that preparations were being everywhere made for illuminations.

The Emperor's Regent received, on the 5th, in the palace of St. Cloud, on the occasion of his recent arrival in that residence, the Mayor's Municipal Councilors and Cures of the Communes of St. Cloud and Boulogne, the officers of the Third Battalion of the National Guard of the Seine, and the officers of the infantry and cavalry of the Imperial Guard in garrison at St. Cloud. The Imperial Prince was present at the reception.

The Italians in Paris are in the highest spirits at the allied success. These, says a correspondent, with whom I have conversed extensively, are the most sincere and disinterested friends of the French Republic, and their present arduous undertaking. They feel no uneasiness about the stories which impute to him intentions to carve out thrones for Prince Napoleon and Murat. I have been told that the former before he left Paris repeatedly assured the Italian envoys that he would make no such terms, that nothing would induce him to canvass for or to accept the government of any Italian State, and that it was his firm determination to live in France and remain a French Prince.

The news that Generals Espinasse and Clere were killed at the battle of Magenta is confirmed. The body of General Espinasse was embalmed, and will be brought home to France. Most of the evening papers say that Marshal Canrobert was wounded, but I have heard this afternoon that the Emperor has contradicted this news. It is confirmed that Gen. McMahon was wounded, and the Press says that Gen. Melline, commanding the first division of the Guards, was wounded seriously. No news from the theater of war has been made public to-day, and considerable surprise is felt at the delay in announcing the entry of the allied into Milan. The fact that the municipality of Milan waited upon the King of Sardinia at headquarters, to inform him, in the presence of the Emperor, that they had proclaimed the annexation of Lombardy to Sardinia, shows almost conclusively that the allies had not yet taken Milan from the military possession of the capital.

A man falls in love as he falls down stairs. It is an accident—perhaps, and a very probable misfortune; something which he neither intended nor foresaw nor apprehended. But when he runs in debt, it is done knowingly and traditiously, and he is not to be pitied, but foolishly, even if not ridiculously, miserably and ruinously.

The fellow who wrote the above never had eroino bills to meet!
