THE TRUSTS AND THOSE MOST EFFECTED

In his address before the National Grange at its annual convention in Hartford, Connecticut Wednesday, Master M. J. Bachelder declared that the operations of the trusts and monopolies fall heaviest upon the farmers and they have no recourse. He represents that the farmers are at the mercy of the trust magnates because they are forced to pay trust prices for what they buy and are unable to form a trust in farm products because of the necessarily competitive nature of their business.

Little reliance can be placed in the statement of a man in the position of Mr. Bachelder. Were he at the head of any other organization like the miners, moulders, steel workers, cotton growers, wool growers, or any similar organization he would represent that the men under him in the particular organization suffered most because of the operations of the trust. The one proposition which will bear inspection is this. The man who buys the most trust made and trust controlled goods and who has the least to sell to the trusts is the man who is most seriously affected. This trust operation affects rich and poor alike.

The only difference is that the poor man feels it most. It is a very difficult matter to say what particular class of persons is most affected. The only way to arrive at a decision is to apply the above proposition to each case and arrive at a conclusion in that way. There is no question but that the farmer is affected by trust manipulation, but it must be remembered that while he pays tribute to the trusts when he buys most of the articles he purchases, at the same time, he levies a tribute when he disposes of his farm products. The benefits he receives may not be in proportion to the tribute he pays, but where, outside of the trust circles, can you find the man who does profit by the operations of the combine?

It is a very difficult matter for any man to place his hand upon any class of people and say it is the one most seriously affected. Mr. Bachelder undertook a very great undertaking and we are inclined to think that he let his enthusiasm run away with his better judgment.

The one clause of the Federal Constitution, which President Roosevelt takes seriously, and which as he construes it makes all other clauses superfluous and nugatory, is the "general welfare" clause. He regards himself as the sole judge of the general welfare. His "policies" are all directed to the general welfare. He knows nothing, and he cares for nothing, but the general welfare. Constitutional limitations upon his power or upon the power of Congress must be regarded as strait jackets, and shattered accordingly. For to him, the general welfare means Roosevelt's political welfare, the increase of his power, the destruction of local self-government, and the concentration of all political power in his own hands. This Hamiltonian interpretation of the Constitution is nothing new in Republican policies. It is merely intensified under the present administration.

There is evidently method in the third term madness. The Washington Post, of October 25th, contains the following headlines: "Talk of third term. Nearly every caller at the White House booms the President. Incidentally seek offices." This seems to be putting the cart before the horse. Really, these Republicans seek offices and incidentally boom the President for a third term just to show that they are mean enough to sell their birthright for a mess of pottage.

Republican tariff reformers having studied the tariff question for a number of years have now decided they need two more years to find out what to do about it. Their standard brethren long ago decided that the reformers knew nothing about the tariff issue. Under such conditions how can the Republican party be expected to revise the tariff, either before or "after election?"

Some Republican genius proposes to secure Uncle Joe Cannon's rye crop extract the essence of it by distillation, and distribute this distillate in small bottles among the farmers of the country just to give them a taste of the good things in store for them when Farmer Cannon becomes President. It is guaranteed to make a man feel prosperous whether he is so or not.

The recent financial cyclone, which struck Wall street, may have had something to do with President Roosevelt's determination to oppose "In God We Trust" being placed on the coin of the realm.

Street railway magnates have failed in their efforts to lure away Secretary Loeb from the president's side. Their next attack should be among employes on the Panama canal.

A few lessons in the use of fire arms would not be out of order in some Marion homes, this evening, in view of the fact that the hunting season begins tomorrow.

It has been some months since a flare up in the Canal Zone. Are things running smoothly or is it only a smouldering volcano?

The open season for game opens tomorrow. Hunting accident accounts may now be expected to be served up daily.

Now that the elections are over, the railroads are getting back into the lime light with a number of wrecks each day.

What Others Say.

SHOULD DOCTORS TELL.
The newspapers—several of them at least—are discussing whether a physician should tell a patient that his case is hopeless or permit him to die in ignorance of his true condition. Naturally there is much argument on both sides of the question, and just as naturally there are papers taking either side.

In the good days when greater stress was placed upon the death-bed repentance than is at present placed upon it by the average man, it was deemed the duty of the doctor to notify the patient as early as possible that death was near, in order that the patient might "make his peace" as it was sometimes called. Frequently a deathbed scene was more in the nature of a prayer meeting than anything else, and it will not do to minimize the consolation that occasionally went to distressed loved ones to know that the departed had finally "made his peace."

But, as stated, at this time the average person does not take much stock in death-bed repentances. There is no way of knowing to what extent a final contrition, just before death, may influence one's condition in another world, but most people have come to believe that whatever judgment is to be passed upon us after death, will be based upon the acts of a lifetime rather than upon the pleadings of the person when he finds he can no longer live. Besides, there were too many death-bed repentances like that of the Kentuckian, who, when he was about to die, called his enemies around the bedside and apologized to them, but stated that if he got well the apology "didn't go."

The case of the Missouri murderer who "got religion" when he was about to be hung is also cited by those who do not believe in deathbed repentances. The fellow had cruelly murdered his wife, who was a good woman and mother, but not a member of a church. Upon the gallows the murderer said that the only regret he had was that as she was taken away before she had time to prepare to meet her Maker, as he had done.

So that there used to be greater reason, in the minds of men, why a patient who was hopelessly stricken. However, there is a good deal still to be said upon the subject because of the effect upon the sick person of such information.

It is well known that in nearly every case death is hastened by the knowledge that it is near. A few people, especially a number of soldiers upon the battlefield, have been informed that they were about to die and refused to believe it and got well. An Ohio soldier at Missionary Ridge who was shot "through and through" with a large ball, was informed that it was not necessary to have the wound dressed as he could not survive the night. It made him mad and he swore at the surgeon and said he would show him that the surgeon did not know what he was talking about. Up to a few years ago the soldiers was still living and enjoying life. But such cases are exceptional. As a general proposition people do not recover after they are informed they are about to die. Of course there is good reason for the doctor to make such a statement—the chances must be all against the patient or the statement would not be made—but it is probable that such a statement from a physician would prove fatal whether the disease was a fatal one or not.

Then, there is the question of whether it is better to permit one to die hoping and believing that he is going to recover; the question of whether it is not a duty we owe to every sufferer to make his last moments as pleasant as possible, and not to harrow up his feelings by informing him that his bark is being pushed off into the unknown sea. Each must answer the question for himself, of course. Some there may be who want to be informed of the probable termination of the disease; many there are who do not want to hear anything about it. If the physician could know how each person felt about it there would be no question of duty—his duty would be to follow out the wishes of the patient when the malady came to the point where the information could do no harm.

Usually the patient has expressed no desire one way or the other. Generally, he says he wants to know the worst, but doctors know that they can not be governed by what a sinking man says. The problem, then, is wholly in the hands of the physicians, and they must use their own judgment.

It does seem all the more beautiful, however, to permit a stricken person to pass out of this world into another unconscious of the fact that he is closing his eyes upon this good world. That is probably not orthodox, but the columns of a newspaper are not supposed to be any too orthodox. It is the more beautiful to think that the good man gone closed his eyes in peaceful bliss, ignorant of his departure from this world, to open them in another and better world. No fright, no alarm for the safety of the voyage, no pangs or regret at having accomplished so little, no sorrow for the sufferings of the loved ones left behind to encumber the passage over. Just a plain sleep, a closing up of the earthly account, satisfied with the day, unconscious of the morrow, ignorant of the beginning of life, hopeful of the ending—such a death would seem to be the better death the more sensible one.—Springfield, Ohio, Daily News

MRS. BRADLEY
Assistants Turner and Given and Mr. Hoover made all inquiries in Mrs. Bradley's behalf. His partner, Mr. Wells, and Judge Powers, sat with and prompted him.
The charge upon which Mrs. Bradley is being tried is that of deliberately murdering former United States Senator Arthur Brown of Utah in his room at a hotel in this city, Dec. 8, 1906. Mrs. Bradley has admitted the killing and there will be no effort to show that his death resulted from any other cause than the shot fired by her.
It is probable that she will be put on the stand in her own defense with the hope of influencing the jury in reaching the conclusion that her mind was so unsettled by the long continued wrongs which it is alleged she had suffered that she was not responsible for her acts.
She has never made any statement concerning the details of her appearance in the room when the tragedy took place and there is no other living person who was present at that time. It is known, however, that while the shooting occurred at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, she had arrived in the city early that morning, having come direct from her home in Salt Lake, Ut.
The wounds on the senator's body, one of which was on his hand and the other in his abdomen, showed that two shots had been fired. Of these the latter proved fatal within five days.

Putting such information together as they have been able to obtain, Mrs. Bradley's attorneys have reached the conclusion that when she went to the senator's room, which she did immediately upon her arrival, she found there certain letters from Mrs. Annie Adams, the actress, the reading of which greatly incensed her.
She seemed then to have disappeared and not to have returned until the afternoon, when, finding Mr. Brown there, she upbraided him and finding him unwilling to marry her, fired the shots which ended his life.

JURY COMPLETED.
Washington, Nov. 14.—The jury which will try Mrs. Bradley for the murder of ex-senator Brown, of Utah, was completed at 11:20 a. m. accepted by both sides and sworn in. All but one juror is white.
Assistant District Attorney Turner then made the State's opening address. He said:
"Mrs. Anna Bradley went to ex-Senator Brown's office in Salt Lake City the week before he came to Washington, armed with a revolver and threatened to kill him. For days before that she had sought him at his home for this purpose. Subsequently he came to Washington, where she succeeded. We propose to show this shooting was deliberate and premeditated, and the verdict should be murder in the first degree."
Mrs. Bradley broke down completely. Tears came to her eyes and she dropped her face into her hands. As the narrative progressed her anguish increased and her slight frame was shaken with sobs.

Examination of witnesses then began. The story of the murder was retold by the servants at the hotel. As the pistol was presented for identification Mrs. Bradley shuddered and closed her eyes.

Mgr. Lavelle, of St. Patrick's Cathedral, said: "There can be no two ways about this question. It was wholly wrong and indefensible to omit the motto from the coins. There can be no excuse for it, and one of the first things we should do is to fix the responsibility. I certainly should very much like to know who it was that allowed the motto to be left off or authorized the issuing of these coins without it. It was certainly a piece of presumption, to say the least.
"The omitting of this motto is really a gross insult to a God-fearing nation. You may talk, if you will, of the materialistic age and all that sort of thing, but I know in my heart that the people of the United States are a God-loving people, thoroughly and deeply religious, and they will not tolerate any interference of this kind with their ideals. 'In God We Trust' stands as I see Dr. Sires says, for the religion and the patriotism of the people, and all creeds and all denominations will join in the cry against this sacrilege.
"The act merits the severest condemnation from the people from end to end of the country. You cannot offend the religious feelings of a people with impunity. It will be a bad day for the country when the people cast away their motto, 'In God We Trust.'"

DEMONSTRATION WAS ENTIRELY TOO REALISTIC
Plain City, O., Nov. 14.—Prof. Ray Eisey, superintendent of the schools of Jerome township, Union county was killed by careless handling of a shotgun.
Eisey took the gun from the boy to show him how dangerous it was. He asked if it was loaded and was told that it was not. At that instant the gun was discharged, the load hitting Eisey in the chest, causing injuries which resulted in his death before a physician could arrive.
The man's home is in this city. He is survived by a wife.

LOUISVILLE CAR MEN VOTE TO GO ON A STRIKE
Louisville, Ky., Nov. 14.—By a vote heartily in favor of the proposition, the union employes of the Louisville Railway company last night voted to strike. The time for putting the strike in effect was left with an executive committee, but it is understood that the men who number 850 out of 1100 employed, will quit work today or Friday.
The men won a partial victory in a strike last April, which lasted a week and was attended by scenes of great disorder, but there has been constant friction since, due to claims that the company has not lived up to the terms of the agreement, and that the officials have discriminated against union men.

The persons involved are too young for the police to act, and Wilson's offense will be referred to the probate court.
McClure's chances for recovery are remote, as he has a hole in his chest several inches long which is deep and close to an artery.
