FACTS

About The Largest Of Our Planets

At this time of the year the evening star in our sky is Jupiter, which is the largest of the planets, being nearly 1300 times as large as the earth, although it is not nearly so solid, because its density is only about one fourth, so that if the earth were made of lead and Jupiter of marble the proportion would be about as it is, says a New York Sun writer.

A peculiar thing about the difference in the density of the planets is that although things that are on the surface of Jupiter would be very light if we could put them on a pair of earthly scales they are much heavier where they are.

This, as you probably know, is because the force of gravity is so much greater in such a large body, being two or three times as powerful as it is on the earth.

In spite of his immense size Jupiter is a very lively planet. It takes the earth 24 hours to turn over in bed and wake up to see the sun again each day; but Jupiter, although nearly 11 times the diameter of the earth, turns completely round every 10 hours.

But in another respect he is pretty slow, because while the earth goes all around the sun in 365 days, which we call our year, it takes Jupiter 10,455 days to make the round; so you may imagine what a lot of space the calendars will take up on the office walls in Jupiter when they get down to business up there.

Although the sun looks to us very large and brilliant, it looks pretty small from Jupiter, being only one fifth of the size that it seems to us. The consequence is that the planet gets only about one fifth as much light, and if we got as much as an electric light from the sun, 16 candlepower, Jupiter would get about as much as three tallow dips.

Many persons think that when they see a very bright planet in the evening sky it must be Venus, but it is easy to distinguish between them, because Venus is never to be seen at midnight in the south, as Jupiter is. Venus is always southwest in the evening or southeast in the morning.

Jupiter is pretty well supplied with moons, having four of them in good working order and a fifth that is not much account, with three more stragglers on the side. For a long time it was assumed that he had only four and it is remarkable that they were discovered at the same time, on Jan. 7 and 8, 1610, by two astronomers, one in Germany and the other in Italy.

It was not until Sept. 9, 1892, that a fifth moon was discovered with the assistance of the great Lick telescope in California, and since then three more tiny satellites have been found.
