SENTENCE SERMONS IN PULPITS OF EL PASO

Jesus Christ did not choose his beneficent works and worker's miracles to prove he was a son of God, but he did these things because he was the son of God.—Rev. R. T. Hanks at Calvary Baptist church.

The thing most needed in El Paso is not more churches nor larger church rooms, but the outpouring of God's spirit in the coming revival.—Rev. A. N. Evans at Houston Park Methodist church.

God never planted a fig tree to be barren or unfruitful or to be cut down, and no man was born to be damned; he would have all men to be saved. Rev. Henry Pope Bond, at Trinity Methodist church.

There is nothing abnormal about religious revivals. They are to be as much expected as a revival of nature, of business, or politics or in any other department of life.—Rev. C. L. Overstreet at First Presbyterian church.

Temptation is not sin, but it is the yielding to temptation that is sin; it isn't the water on the outside of the boat that sinks it, but the water that gets on the inside of it.—Rev. Frank W. Otto at First Methodist church.

I want to register my protest against the fair being held open on Sunday and call upon the people of this church to give evidence of their indignation by remaining away from it on Sunday.—Rev. P. J. Rice at First Christian church.

Most of our life is away from our church but what part is out of the presence of the Father and without connection with the kingdom of God, only such could be secular, and there is none such.—H. B. Durkee at First Baptist church.

The true object of Christian association is neither commercial nor social nor intellectual (although these things have their place) but rather that we may, like Paul, impart to each other some spiritual gift and thus bring about the brotherhood of God.—Rev. L. E. Martin, of Alamo, at Houston Square Baptist church.

Congregationalists.
 Sunday at the Congregational church was the third week of the congregation's occupancy and the little room was filled to overflowing.

"The Emanuel Movement" in Boston was the subject of Rev. Miles Hanson's sermon Sunday morning. The preacher insisted that there were diseases that were amenable to auto-suggestion and other forms of mental treatment, and diseases that the trained physician must tackle, and that one treatment is as distinctly divine as the other. The preacher took his date about the Boston movement from the well known book of its founder, "Fidelity and Medicine," by Dr. Worcester.

The Congregationalists have already secured a lot for the little church they hope to build in the near future, in the almost churchless district surrounding the Baldwin sanitarium.

HASKIN TELLS OF FIRST INSURGENTS

son by a strong South American policy in pursuance of an Monroe doctrine, and insisted upon a protective tariff and internal improvements. The protective doctrine alienated the south, but as the Democrats were careful not to commit themselves on the tariff, it did not succeed in uniting the north. Although at this distance it is clear that the administration of the second Adams made a most excellent record for itself, the people of that day looked upon Adams as a Federalist in disguise, who sought to build up an aristocracy and to do by insinuation what his father had failed to do by direct methods. The Adams administration was without its own volition forced into the position of representing the aristocratic idea as opposed to the Democratic concept of government. It was a remarkable coincidence that in 1828 John Quincy Adams received electoral votes only from the same states which were carried by his father in 1800, while Jackson carried all the Jefferson states of 1800 and all of the new states which had been added to the union, with the exception of Maine, which was, of course, included in Massachusetts in 1800.

No Anti-Slave Sentiment.

It is furthermore remarkable that while the Adams Whig party was successful only in New England, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, and a part of New York, the sectional divisions of the parties was not yet apparent. Both Jackson and Calhoun were from slave states and both were large slave holders, yet the Democratic ticket carried Pennsylvania by more than two to one and received 73 of its 178 votes from the free states. Adams received a total of 83 electoral votes, of which nine were from slave states, so that in the free states the Whigs cast but one more electoral vote than the Democrats. This fact was cited by Thomas H. Benton to show that in 1828, almost a decade after the Missouri compromise, there was no hostile sentiment at the north toward the slave holding states. The new Democracy did not intend to limit its demand for control over the offices of those chosen by vote. They demanded that the representatives of the "oligarchy" holding federal offices by appointment, should be removed and that their places be filled by representatives of the "people." Before the end of Adams' administration, and after it would succeed to the presidency, the Democratic senate refused to confirm nominations made by Adams, and every place possible was held open for the incoming administration. When Gen. Jackson got to Washington before his inauguration he was literally besieged by hungry office seekers. More because of the temper of his party and outside pressure than because of his own desires, Jackson turned out the own partisans in their place, and thus was established the influence of federal patronage in national politics, which has been used by every president since that time.

Trouble Ahead.

But there was trouble ahead. The tariff question was becoming acute, and threatened to assume the form of a sectional dispute. The agitation for the purchase of Texas was bringing the slavery question into public attention. One or the other of these purely sectional issues must have become the principal issue if it had not been for a personal conviction of Gen. Jackson. In his first message to congress, against the advice and in opposition to the will of his cabinet and of his most trusted advisers, he made an attack upon the Bank of the United States. The bank was not at that time a political issue, but Jackson's attack made it so. Instantly the country was plunged into a great political struggle between Jackson, backed by the new Democracy and by the "machines" of New York and Pennsylvania on the one hand, and the Bank of the United States, backed by money power, on the other.

C. JUAREZ HOLDS A KERMESS FETE

Constitution plaza in Ciudad Juarez was at its best Sunday night, and hundreds of young people were at their best for the social occasion of the month in the Mexican city. It was a kermess given by the society women of the city for a fund to build sidewalks about the old Guadalupe mission, which faces the plaza.

An enclosure was roped in, and admission charged to the circumscribed hall. While the housewives cooked behind canvas walls, young women served typical Mexican dishes at tables set under the trees. Other girls served refreshments and sold confetti, which rained a continual shower during the evening. The boy's band of Rey Reyes gave a concert early in the evening, and later his orchestra played for those who danced on an enclosed section of the wide walks. The plaza was specially lighted by electricity and Japanese lanterns.
