Early Days In the Mormon Colonies

By Lexia Harris, Colonia Dublin, Chih., Mex.

A BAND of Temesacchic Indians headed for the colonies, has been sighted in the western hills. It was the exciting word spread in the little town of Colonia Juarez in its early settlement.

"Everybody to the meeting house for safety!" was the alarming order next heard. While the school house bell rang to call the farthest neighbors in, the nearest were busy conveying bedding and what cooked food they had on hand to the place of safety.

"They are spies," said brother Romney, "come in to see if we were prepared for them and to locate the places to be pillaged tonight. Two good men must follow and locate them. Five others must go to Casas Grandes and ask for armed protection."

According to appointment Orson Brown and James Stowell followed the Indians, and Martin Jones, Benjamin Mead and Jesse Smith (three instead of five) followed the road to Casas Grandes, the county seat and the head of the district.

"Good-bye, Jennie," said Benjamin to his sister, giving her a loving kiss, "take good care of father and mother till I return."

"Aren't you going to say good-bye to them?" she asked, stealing a frightened glance at him through a pair of clear blue eyes.

"I just left them both in tears, comfort them. I am in no immediate danger, and if I were it would be necessary for some to risk their lives for the safety of the colonies, and I am no better than the others."

The spies were the first to return. "We have located the Indians," said brother Bowen to the excited settlers, and there must be an hundred of them in the hills just west of town."

"What will we do for something to eat?" asked many voices. "We can't live forever without cooking. The bread is nearly gone, the children are crying for food, and the cows are still in the pasture."

"Let us cook and eat Mexican fashion," suggested Jennie Mead, the jolliest girl in town, with a toss of her pretty head, which looked all the prettier for her cheerful countenance in this time of trial and sacrifice.

"If you will take the lead, Jennie, I know it will be a success, and you can depend upon me for a close ally," said Mary Hardy, with a smile parting her rosy lips, and her dreamy brown eyes sparkling with fun.

"You are always on hand to do someone a good turn, Mary, who may the happy recipient be this time?" asked Benjamin Mead, who had stepped in just in time to hear the last remark.

At the sound of his voice, all eyes were turned toward the door, a general rush was made for him, many arms were open to embrace him, many blessings were pronounced upon his head, and many tears dropped in gratitude for the safe return of the party, each member of which was received in like manner. The questions were so be the first to meet you," she whispered as he was leaving.

Colonists' Hearts Heavy.

The five chosen men mounted their steeds and the whole colony watched them ride away. There was no merriment though some did smile through their tears, as they waved their handkerchiefs in a last farewell.

A half hour's ride in a southwest-erly direction brought the boys to a deep gulch, and brother Bowen reining his horse under a large cedar tree, cried "Halt!"

"I fancy," said he, "that the Indians are over in yonder hollow. If we follow the trail we will be sighted by the face with his axes, locate their camp, and we will be in imminent danger. If we leave the trail I don't know whether we will be able to cross the gulch or not, it is so obstructed with rocks, fallen trees, shrubbery and holes. I will leave it to a vote which road we will choose."

"Let us avoid the beaten trail," said Mead.

"Does any one know the country?" asked Bowen, "could any one act as guide?"

"None had crossed the gulch, but all thought it wisdom to try."

"Keep a sharp lookout, everyone of you, and carry your gun free from its scabbard so you could use it immediately. I will lead, follow in my trail, one directly behind the other."

Of those stumbling men and stumbling horses, James Smith was the first to regain the desired spot and he nudged the boys behind him a large rock that brother Bowen called to him and asked: "What is the matter, James?"

Enemy in Full View.

"The enemy are in full view just across the gulch," he said excitedly, rubbing the hot perspiration from his face with his sleeve.

A consultation was held, and to avoid the greater of two evils, they all, except Smith, voted to go forward.

"Look," said Bowen, pointing in the direction of the pursuit, as they stood sheltered in a miniature grove, "we will have to make a dash for our lives over a stretch of 75 or 100 yards, in full view of the enemy and in easy range of their guns."

"I think it would be safer to return the way we came."

"That would be impossible," quickly responded impulsive Jesse Romney. "If we were to get entangled amongst those rocks as we did coming, they could overstep his countenance."

Brother Smith said no more, but a cloud overspread his countenance.

"Make ready," said Bowen, "follow in marching order, do not allow the grass to grow under your horse's hoofs, keep the trail, and do not rein your horses too tight, lest they should fall. Above all do not put your trust in the speed of your horses, or in your own dexterity, and away he flew with his followers in close pursuit."

The Indians stood in readiness, and their bullets flew around the gauntlet runners like hail upon the sands. As soon as Orson reached a place of safety he dismounted and watched his gallant companions making the home stretch.

"Look!" he shouted, "James Smith has fallen. Up my bay, up, and run for your life!" He shuddered as he saw the Indians all direct their aim at the fallen man and brute. The man who had been behind him passed his fallen companion in his mad race for safety. As quick as a flash, James regained his footing, once more swinging himself in the saddle, and giving rein to his horse, the noble animal, as if ashamed of himself, seemed to redouble his speed, and he carried his rider in triumph to the tree.

"Hurrah!" cried the boys in unison, as they threw up their hats to welcome their brother in arms to their midst. Hugs and congratulations went round, as each man congratulated the giver of all good gifts for their miraculous escape.

Running Fight Follows.

"Every man to his horse," cried Bowen as he saw the Indians making preparations to follow them. A cloud of light and dust, fortunately none of the boys were killed and if any of the Indians were mortally wounded they carried their companions with them in their flight for there were no traces left.

As soon as the boys came in sight of their guarded homes, they saw two well known figures running to meet them. Orson Brown and Benjamin Mead were soon by the sides of the two girls and with locked arms, they walked to the meeting house and the girls earned of all that had happened.

"Brother Smith," said the old patriarch Johnson, after listening to the account, "your life was spared because of your obedience to orders, may it be a lesson to you to be willing to take counsel."

The news was conveyed to the soldiers and they received it with perceptible fear.

Deserted by Soldiers.

"It is clear," said their leader, that our duty calls upon us to protect the Casas Grandes settlers. You are more able to cope with the enemy than the Mexicans are, so the next morning bright and early, before breakfast they commenced their homeward march.

The soldiers were afraid of the Temesacchic and the Temesacchic were afraid of the soldiers, so both parties left the new colony unharmed, and unprotected.
