KANSAS TOWNSITE TO BE PLOWED UP

Once Had 2000 Population; With Waterworks and Public Buildings

Hutchison, Kan., Nov. 17.—Eastern holders of bonds issued by the town of Springfield in southwestern Kansas, will be interested in the news that the townsite long deserted has been sold and will be plowed for wheat. Springfield once had 2000 population, and was the scene of a bitter fight over the county seat. It built a $10,000 school house and installed a system of waterworks, the hydrants having long been used for posts to which the cattle herders hitched their ponies. It had two hotels and many stores, and was looked upon as one of the leading business prospects of the southwest. But the railroad passed it by the county seat went elsewhere, and the population vanished.

For a time, a dozen families remained among the ghosts of the town's glory. It shared the fate of several ambitious towns of the short grass country.

Now the Santa Fe is building across the five railroadless counties of the southwest, and towns are being picked up bodily and moved to the road. One town, Ulysses, recently moved a mile from its old location to avoid the bonds issued when it was in its boom days. The bondholders had instigated against it, and all they can secure is a section of raw prairie worth perhaps $10 an acre. These experiences have been paid for by the settlers as well as by the eastern investors, for where the towns have vanished it means the loss of the property of the men who settled them. But the southwest is finding itself, and by the consolidation of towns and the building of railroads and automobile highways it is getting such municipal facilities as it can afford—and no more—giving a stability that has never been known in the more hysterical days of early boom methods.

Say Working Woman Over 40 Has No Chance to Get Work

New York, N. Y., Nov. 17.—Miss Mary E. Dreier, the head of the Woman's Trade Union league, in common with Arthur R. Holder, who recently told the Employers' Liability commission in Washington that a man who is over 40 and begins to show gray hairs, has no chance to secure work. It is equally positive that the same thing is applicable to the working woman of today.

"In order to get work today," Miss Dreier said, "a woman must look young, and in fact, be young. This matter of an age limit is harder on women than on men. A great many men seem to grow young under the daily habit of work, but it is never so with a woman, especially in the trades and in the shops. The majority of them are forced to go to work when they are children and they have to work hard. The natural result of this is that they lose the bloom of youth earlier than women who are tenderly cared for and lead a sheltered life. In most cases they do not have to wait until they are 40, before they begin to show the lines of age and the gray hair of worry and hard work. Then if they lose their jobs the appearance of advancing years would be enough to prevent them from getting employment."
