NO BATTLE FOUGHT AT SANTA ROSALIA

Paral Americans Say Rebels Abandoned Town Without Firing a Shot When Gen. Castro's Column Approached Saturday.

Americans from Parral who came through Santa Rosalia say that there was no battle in that town.

Manuel Chao was in command of the rebel rear guard of Gen. Castro's force there. When Gen. Castro marched on the town with 6000 federal troops left for Parral, abandoning the town at 11 o'clock Saturday, Castro's taking charge at noon.

The Americans say that there was a report in Parral last Sunday that Parral was run to the border Thursday night to carry out back to Chihuahua.

The telegraph line was working as far south as Santa Rosalia, the American report was no longer in communication from Santa Rosalia south, as the rebels are in control of the Mexican National line below that town.

The Americans had planned to come to Ojinaga and by train from there to Parral, but Gen. Castro advised them to make the trip to Chihuahua on his military train and from there on a freight train to Parral.

The American mining men brought more of the revolutionary money which they had hidden in the mountains.

The American report that the Parral Electric & Telephone company and the Alvarado Mining company are the only going concerns in the camp.
