The Adventures of AVERAGE JONES Gentleman Detective By SAMUEL HOPKINS ADAMS

THE MAN WHO SPOKE LATIN. (Continued From Yesterday.)

"Now sit tight," added Jones. He stepped, soft-footed, on the thick old rug, across to the library door and threw it open. Just inside Livius, an expression of startled anger on his thin face. Quickly recovering himself, he explained, in his ready Latin, that he was about to enter and speak to his patron.

Hutton's "Epistolae Obscurorum Virorum", which set early sixteenth century Europe a-roar with laughter at the discomfited monks; and he cleaned himself from that tainted atmosphere in the fresh air and free English of a splendid Audubon "first"—and all the time he was conscious that the Roman watched, watched, watched. More than once Livius offered aid, seeking to appease himself of the supposed mute's line of investigation; but the other smilingly fended him off.

Testimony Now Favors Judge

Summer School

PUYALLUP, May 18.—As extra incentive to get Western Washington school teachers to attend the state summer school for the teaching of agriculture at Puyallup June 10, a series of excursions and side attractions will be planned, including a trip to the mountains.

Toes Worth Coin

One toe, $3,000. Ten toes, $30,000. It would seem that a man's feet are surely valuable. Gesozus Plotz, the Cliff avenue philosopher, figured out the other day that a reporter was worth $50,000 because he could earn that much in so many years, but he overlooked an easy bet.

E. E. BULLARD LET OUT.

E. E. Bullard, assistant engineer of the Nisqually power plant, who has had personal supervision of the whole work, has been let out by Commissioner Lawson.

Bunty Pulls Strings And Audience Enjoys Show

Everybody has seen at some time in life a household where the grown daughter was not only the dominant integer in the family, but the one who knew how to dominate too. So "Bunty Pulls the Strings," which opened at the Tacoma last night and repeats tonight and tomorrow night is not only a natural but a very interesting portrayal of life.

TACOMA PRINCESS

MABEL STANTON With Wm. A. Brady's London Company in "Bunty Pulls the Strings" at the Tacoma Tonight and Sunday.

Charles Klein's powerful drama "The Third Degree," which attacks the methods of certain police officials in obtaining confessions from suspected persons or criminals, is to be seen again in Tacoma. This play which has proved one of the most notable successes of recent years, both in New York and on tour, will be the offering next week at the Princess, beginning Sunday afternoon. It will be first time the play has been seen in Tacoma in stock.

THE EMPRESS

Six dancing female bicycle riders will feature the new Empress bill when Bessie Valdare presents her expert lady cyclists.

Another top liner is George Yoeman, who is gifted with a fine singing voice.

Ethel Whiteside and three Picannines present old Southern melodies and dialogue.

Four charming little misses and a young man are the Five Musical MacLarens, whose dress represents the kilted lassies of the Scottish moor and orals.

A vehicle full of comedy and pathos of the underworld is "Bill Jonks, Crook."

PANTAGES

The headline at Pantages next week will be Frederick V. Bowers and company in a musical comedy playlet and a bull dog. Miss Jessie Keller, the "Venus on Wheels," will be prominent on the bill.

On the following day, however, an event of more immediate import occupied his mind. He had spent the morning in the up-stairs library, at the unevadable suggestion of Colonel Graeme, while the colonel and his Roman colleague below. Coming down about noon, Average Jones entered the colonel's small study just in time to see Livius, who was alone in the room, turn away sharply from the desk. His elbow was held close to his ribs in a peculiar manner. He was concealing something under his coat. With a pretense of clumsiness, Average Jones stumbled against him in passing. Livius drew away his high forehead working with suspicion. The Ad-Visor's expression of blank apology, eked out with a bow and a primace, belied the busy-working mind within. For, in the moment's contact, he had heard the crisp rustle of paper from beneath the ill-fitting coat. What paper had the man from B. C. taken furtively from his benefactor's table? It must be large; otherwise he could have readily thrust it into his pocket. No sooner was Livius out of the room than Average Jones scanned the desk. His face lighted with a sudden smile. Colonel Graeme never read a newspaper; boasted, in fact, that he wouldn't have one about the place. But, as Average Jones distinctly recalled, he had, himself, that very morning brought in a copy of the Globe and dropped it into the scrap-basket near the writing-table. It was gone. Livius had taken it. "If he's got the newspaper-reading habit," said Average Jones to himself, "I'll set a trap for him. But Warren must furnish the bait." He went to look up his aide. The conference between them was long and exhaustive, covering the main points of the case from the beginning. "Did you find out from Colonel Graeme," inquired Average Jones, "whether Livius affected any particular brand of literature?" "Yes. He seems to be specializing on late seventeenth century British classicism. Apparently he considers that the flower of British scholarship of that time wrote a very inferior kind of dog-Latin." "Late seventeenth century Latinity," commented Average Jones. "That—er—gives us a fair start. Now as to the body-servant." "Old Saul? I questioned him about strange callers. He said he remembered only two, besides an occasional peddler or agent. They were looking for work." "What kind of work?" "Inside the house. One wanted to catalogue the library." "What did he look like?" "Saul says he wore glasses and a worse tall hat than the colonel's and had a full beard." "And the other?" "Bookbinder and repairer. Wanted to fix up Colonel Graeme's collection. Youngish, smartly dressed, with a small waxed moustache." "And our Livius is clean-shaven," murmured Average Jones. "How long apart did they call?" "About two weeks. The second applicant came on the day of the last snowfall. I looked that up. It was March 27." (Continued Monday.)
