MERMAIDS DISCUSS MAN AS HE IS AT THE SEASHORE

Two Dainty Mermaids. The taller is Miss Helen McGregor and by her side Miss Hazel Bess Laugenour of Pantages.

When two pretty girls get together and discuss man—well, if you're so fortunate as to be the only man about, it's all off. It is delightful—at first—but when they begin speaking of weaknesses and ugliness and all-around meanness and worthlessness, you can feel your liver, stomach, heart and all the rest, with a sudden lurch, take a sudden and sickening thud into your boots.

Now, Miss Hazel Bess Laugenour and Miss Helen McGregor, two of the daintiest water witches on the coast, got together in Tacoma. It was yesterday. Miss McGregor is the young high school girl who swam across Quartermaster harbor last summer, not long after the time when Miss Laugenour startled the world by proclaiming herself mistress of the torrent that rushes through Golder Gate straits in California.

After hearing them discuss at length the insignificance of man as a swimmer yesterday, it is a surprise that the humble male thing is daring enough even to attempt the bath tub.

In the water man is a boob, a first class A No. 1 mutt. He doesn't know the difference between a tidal wave and the back stroke, and it's a wonder they're not all dead of drowning.

"I've seen lots of them, fat ones and skinny ones, trying to swim down on the California beaches," said Miss Laugenour. "They have a stroke that resembles the waddle of a hippopotamus. It's so funny I've called it the 'old fat man stroke.' They stay right in the same place all the time, unless the tide is moving them, spouting and puffing and heaving the water frantically. And they think they're having so much fun."

Miss McGregor agreed with her but was certain Tacoma men were worse than Californians ever thought of being. But Miss McGregor had something new for her sister maid of the water—an entirely new stroke. It is a combination of the breast and over hand strokes, and is the one Miss McGregor used when she made the distance of two miles across Quartermaster harbor in the remarkable time of 68 minutes.

Miss Laugenour was delighted with the new stroke and if she finds it as advantageous as her somewhat larger swimmer girl friend she will probably use it when she swims the English channel next year.

Miss Laugenour swam Quartermaster harbor herself some few years ago, but took a short distance than Miss McGregor.

Both young women are the embodiment of health itself. And both love the water. Their complexions are clear, their eyes sparkling, and their hair is a lovely mass of wave washed sunlight.

And the ocean did it.

SETTLE DOWN TO BUSINESS

Senator Paulhanus stirred up a hornet's nest when he suggested that voters should vote for Roosevelt instead of Woodrow Wilson at Valhalla hall the other night and said he had found teachers he employed in the summer as not up to standard.

It aroused the Irish of Miss Mary Flanagan, a teacher attending the county institute, and she presented a resolution at yesterday's session demanding that Paul either retract or explain himself.

Chairman E. B. Walker of the institute tried to rule the resolution out of order but the teachers protested and things were lively for a few minutes until Superintendent Cox sidetracked the whole subject by introducing other business.

Superintendent C. E. Beach of Olympia schools and candidate for state superintendent on the bull moose ticket, spoke to the institute for the teachers retirement fund.

Probably more than a few have wondered what has become of the women of North End hill. Naturally this favored section contributes its goodly share of love-liness to society functions and high-brow piffings, but for a week its beauty has remained recalcitrantly at home.

But it has developed it was not through premeditation on the part of the recalcitrants. In fact there have been seven days of impatience and high-strung petulance on North End hill.

Yesterday, taking the advantage of the brief but universally welcomed appearance of His Majesty Jule Pluvius, a dozen of the most comely, their umbrellas hooked close down over their heads, dodged across the street to the home of another forced hermitess, and held an indignation bee.

A certain very lovely, but elderly lady was given the upbraiding of her life. Many varicolored things were said of her, subsequent to which a committee was appointed to visit the police and register a very feminine but forceful kick.

Arriving at the station, the whole affair was disclosed and the reason for the suddenly developed stay-at-home tendency exploded. Police officials learned that the "dear old lady" whom everyone thought was such a "perfectly charming dear," had fled the hill, and, to all accounts, the city, with the hair belonging to the North End hill feminine. As proof, the committee removed their millinery and disclosed to the horrified officers the bald facts. They displayed lovely if somewhat scant tresses done in the most approved back-to-nature styles, as they explained that their elderly acquaintance had robbed them of their switches, curls, rats, puffs, and other head adornments, with the exception of their own natural hair, on the pretense that she would remodel and dye the articles to appear more pleasing to the eye.

"Why didn't the other victims come with you?" queried the perfectly heartless and unchivalrous police officers.

"Well—well," was the reply. "Don't you see they couldn't very well." And the committee swished haughtily out.

Ely, they held a straw ballot with the results: Roosevelt, 7; Wilson, 3; Taft, 2.
