To Experiment For Eggs on Oregon Farm

Poultry breeding for egg yield is the object of experiment No. 201 of the Oregon Agricultural Experiment League. There probably is nothing which will do more to advance the poultry industry and increase the profits of production than systematic breeding of this kind.
Undoubtedly 25 or 50 per cent of the hens in most farm flocks do not lay enough eggs to pay for their keep. The trap-nest is the only thing, so far as known, that will demonstrate this and will tell which hens do the laying. If a farmer in each county joins the league, trap-nests a flock, and then saves the best for breeding purposes, his neighbors would come to him for eggs for hatching and for cockerels from the best layers in his flock and it would not be long before every farmer in the county had stock bred from good layers.
The league proposes to make three separate experiments. In the first a three months' record of the eggs laid by each hen in the flock is kept. In the second a similar record for six months is kept, and in the third a whole year's record. It is best, if possible, to start the experiments at the beginning of the laying year, and to use pullets. The work may begin when the flock begins laying. Nov. 1 is a good time to start a year's record, or it may start Oct. 1, or Dec. 1.
In the first three months the early fall and winter layers may be picked out. Those will be the kind to breed from rather than others which, though they may lay as many eggs in the year, do so in the season when eggs are cheaper.
A six months' record will show fairly well which are the more profitable hens. At the end of that time there could be a weeding out or killing off of the poorest layers. Some will do pretty well for six months, but will fall short in twelve months, so they may be removed from the flocks when the end of the year shows conclusively which were the poor producers.
The remaining fowls would be those which had made a good year's record. The best of these should be selected for the breeding flock, and the pullets hatched from their eggs trap-nested the year after. Those who wish to build trap-nests like those originated at the Oregon Agricultural College may obtain a bulletin showing how they are made, together with blanks for keeping egg records, by writing to the extension division of the college.
