NOTHING BUT JAPS IN FLORIN NOW

A street scene in Florin, California town owned by Japs, and photograph of the Japanese school teacher of Florin, and his family.

FLORIN, Cal., May 8.—Florin, California, is a town of Japs. It is nine miles from Sacramento, the state capital, in the heart of one of the richest agricultural empires in the world. The railroad cuts the town in two. The main street runs for perhaps a half mile on either side of the railroad at right angles to the track. A few houses cluster together in groups on either side of this street crowding each other closely. But for the most part, the houses are scattered and far apart. Most of the houses are low, squat, untidy, unpainted shacks. Those buildings that are not shacks were once occupied by white people. Their owners have long since fled, literally driven out by the little brown men who now occupy their premises. Less than one-fourth of its population of 500 are white; the rest are Japs.

Florin has: Two Jap stores. One Jap barber shop. One Jap boarding house that furnishes meals for nine cents each. One Jap blacksmith shop. One Jap school, and one Jap shoe shop.

John Reese is the only white man who owns a store in Florin. "Eight years ago," he said, "Florin was a flourishing town. There were two hotels, three grocery stores, and a drug store here, all run by white folks."

In the supporting company are such well known players as Mary Boland, Mr. Drew's leading woman, Nina Sevensing, Hubert Druce, Margaret Watson, Alice John and others.

"The Creation of Fire" is the headliner at the Melbourne theater for tomorrow and Saturday. The film is very instructive and interesting; as it shows the chemical properties of fire and tells in picture form what substances when rightly applied will create fire.
