Confessions of a Wife

(Copyright, 1914, by the Newspaper Enterprise Association.)

I dropped in at the bookshop this morning. Mary looked surprisingly pretty as I entered. She was gowned in a plain, little, black frock with white turn-over cuffs and collar, the one note of distinction being a bunch of fresh violets at her belt. I was wondering who had given them to her when she looked up with a perfectly dazzling smile. "Mary's teeth and smile are the prettiest things about her."

"I tell you I'm glad to see you, Margie." "You know how busy I've been, Mary." "You don't need to apologize, dear girl. I know about all the things you have been through, and I kept out of it because I knew that I could not help you. I also know, dear, that if I had needed you you would have been on the spot."

"Dad and Dick say you are the best little bookshop-keeper in the business." "Did they say that?" asked Mary, and her gaze that exquisite smile glorified her face. "I can't tell you how good Dick has been to me. He has gone over any the books with me daily and showed me just how to keep things straight. Of course, the bookkeeper is all right, but I wanted to know about it. "At first the clerks were a little adverse to taking orders from me, but Dick settled that. Since Jack got well he has only been here occasionally after the first two or three days."

"Margie," continued Mary, rather breathlessly, after she had shut the door of the little cubby she called her office, "I have not told this to anyone, but Jack and I have had a perfectly dreadful quarrel over the business. He wanted to overdraw his drawing account. (He had done this to the extent of $700 before he was sick.) I told him that he could only draw $100 a month and that the other fifty would have to apply on his debt to the firm."

"He—he almost struck me when I was so angry, and asked me when I was made guardian of his business and his money."

"I told him that both Dick and Dad said I was to be kept in charge, and until they told me I was not doing right I should run the business as I thought best. I think I was right to say this, for the sales have enlarged surprisingly since I took hold of it. "He sneeringly said he had noticed a number of the men about town had become alarming studious of late." Mary blushed slightly. "Of course, I can't turn any man away who wants to buy books, Margie, but the two big sales I have made, both reaching to over a thousand dollars, have been made to women, and they were both so pleased. One of them sent me these violets this morning, with the prettiest little note. You see, I stocked her library for her. She had never suddenly come into money and I have made a good customer."

"Where did you get your knowledge of books, Mary?" I asked, somewhat astonished that an ex-chorus girl should blossom out as a student. It was not at all according to the popular traditions. "My father was a great student and I began to read under his tuition before I was seven. By the time he died my taste was formed. While the other girls were out having what they called 'a good time' I was usually in my room reading."

"You are a very wonderful girl, my dear sister," I said as I put my arm about her. To my surprise she burst into tears. "Oh, Margie, Margie, I seem to have made such a mess of my life. I went into the chorus when my father died, for I did not know what else to do. Margie, I had never had a sweetheart in my life when I met Jack, and I know now that I was terribly lonely; that my soul was crying out for its mate."

"Jack, as you know, is handsome and he was devoted to me. He lied to me with those attentions that a man supposedly reserves only for the girl he loves and intends to marry. I loved him unreservedly, and although it would have given myself to him as unreservedly, but he insisted upon marrying me secretly. I wanted to wait, but he insisted, and I loved him."

Q.—While at the show this evening I sat next to a very nice appearing young man. He acted as though he would like to have started a conversation, as well as I would have.

He left at the same time I did and walked down the street behind me. After standing on the corner for a few moments, he crossed the street and went into a saloon. Now, don't you think, Miss Grey, if this boy had some friends, which I really don't believe he has, from the way he acted, that he would be much better off?

I would just love to know him; but get of no way in which to get acquainted with him. S. E. C.

A.—No, I don't either, if that's what you want advice about. You are a fair example of the foolish young girls who make the acquaintance of "pink cuffs" at picture shows or other places of like amusement and then come to grief shortly after. You must be a talented mindreader if you can ascertain by merely watching a young man for a few moments whether he has any friends or not.

Q.—Several times I have gone to you with my trouble and you have never failed to give me good, sound advice; therefore, I hope you will give me your opinion in a matter that is of vital importance to me.

I am engaged to marry a young man and I wish to know whether or not I ought to tell him that I am of illegitimate birth. I have talked it over with two of my friends who know the circumstances and one says "tell him now so there may be no misunderstanding," and the other says "never let him know unless it is absolutely necessary."

What shall I do? If you can spare the space in your columns, might I have one or two readers' opinions? Thanking you for your kindness to me in the past, I remain, PERPLEXED.

A.—Unfortunately, none of us have the privilege of saying how we shall be brought into this world. If we did, undoubtedly a number of us would change our environment.

I hold most emphatically that it is not necessary for you to speak to the man you are to marry about your birth. Why try to explain or account for a wrong which you have not the power to rectify? A child of illegitimate birth is just as innocent, just as pure as a child born in wedlock. Those who would condemn motherhood, denounce the greatest law of the Universe.

Q.—I am in a quandry. The other day I received a letter from my mother saying to come and make my home with her. My folks are well off now, and I know they would give me a good home. But when I was a mere girl of 16 I was compelled to leave home and make my own living as they said they could no longer feed and clothe me. When I left home, I came to the coast, found work and stayed in one place three years, and in another two years. Like most of other girls, I found a nice gentleman, my friend and we were married.

My husband is almost twice my age and I am not yet 25. We have been married two years. My mother wants to part us. She says he is too old for me, but, Miss Grey, he is good to me. I have everything a girl could wish for. Do you think my mother is doing right to influence me to leave my husband and marry a rich man? We are poor people, but my husband works every day and we enjoy our little home. Give me your best advice and I will follow it. ANNA.

A.—Ordinarily, parents would do well to keep their noses out of their married children's business. Your parents might buy you a rich husband, but they cannot buy love for you. If you have a good husband and a happy home, what more could any girl wish for?

The Almighty Dollar proves quite a temptation to some of us at times, but cold gold is a poor substitute for true love. When your case is boiled down it is purely that of gold versus love. Is your love of gold greater than that of husband and home? You must decide.

CATARRH TROUBLE ENDED BY HYOMEI

An Inexpensive Easily Used and Most Effective Remedy.

Surely try Hyomei, nature's harmless remedy for catarrh, colds, asthma, bronchitis, or croup of children—a treatment that is pleasant to use, and so certain of results that Crown Drug Co. sells it on the "No-cure-no-pay" plan.

Hyomei is not a cure-all but a specific for distressing catarrh and similar ailments. You breathe Hyomei so that its antiseptic medication at once reaches the irritated and diseased tissues, healing and soothing the sore spots.

Get a Hyomei outfit, which contains inhaler and bottle of liquid, at once. Put twenty drops of Hyomei into the inhaler and breathe it a few times during the day. There is no treatment so satisfying for it instantly opens the stopped-up air passages—you breathe freely, the unclean discharges from the nose stop, and dull headaches vanish—even the worst cases respond quickly.
