Confessions of a Wife

(Copyright, 1914, by Newspaper Enterprise Association)
Harry Symone has told Dick that he would pay all hospital bills for Tim, but neither he nor Mr. Hatton want anything said about what they are doing for him.
Like all very rich men they are deluged with begging letters daily—letters from those who will not work and who seem to think that because these men have money they should divide it with them.
"There is nothing so easy to give in this world as money, Miss Margaret," said Annie, when I told her about what these men had done for her. "Don't think, dearie, that I am unappreciative of their kindness, for I am not. You, dear, that's coming down here day after day when I'm sure you are hardly able, are giving yourself."

tale ending. "Then they were married and lived happy ever after." We seldom plan for our daughters after they are married, and yet I feel I have only lived since I was married. Before that I had no problems to solve, no corroding cares to hurt, no different paths of conduct to choose. Life held no great heights nor depths for me. I just drifted on the even level of my days.
Marriage is like waking from vague though pleasant dreams to work-day life.
You can't learn from books what you must know to make a successful marriage for the success of a marriage does not depend on anything but the happiness of not only yourself but the entire family born of that marriage.
Query: "Are there any successful marriages?"
Dick he Donna Tenny's party Dick has been home every night, although the political caudron has been seething. I have been so busy with Annie I have not had time to even hear about Mollie or Mary or even Mother Waverly who Dick says is worrying a good deal about Jack.
I must go over and see her tomorrow, although when I go I am depressed for a week. I have no sympathy, or use for a woman, little book, who because she has been bereft of a husband thinks that her sorrow is unique in this world of tragic happenings.
Grief is to me the most sacred thing on this earth. I could not share it with anyone. I would think that in some way I was sharing my dead, or, perhaps, making them a means of drawing pity and sympathy to myself.
Annie Mary takes her loss as I would want to take mine. She seldom speaks of Uncle John, not because she does not think of him, but because now that he is gone his memory and his love is a hallowed thing not to be shared promiscuously with those who did not love him.
Well, little book, today our confidences have run from birth to death and you, as always, have been discreetly silent, but I know you understand.
"What shall we talk about tomorrow?"

Clothes, Clothes, Clothes

No Trivial Matter to Girl Who Works—What Is Her Idea of the Dresses She Wishes to Have?

BY CYNTHIA GREY.
Fashions have taken to changing with every hour of the clock. So it is not astonishing that the girl who works for a moderate salary grows bewildered and discouraged and sends me questions like this:
"Dear Miss Grey: I wish you would tell me the best way to dress on a limited salary. I am 20 years old and as pretty and popular as the average girl, that is I go out a good deal."
"I have been earning my own money three years and I have tried spending it for dress in this, that and the other way, but I never seem to get the right things."
"Please do not pass this letter over as trivial."

"BARBARA."
Clothes can hardly be called a trivial consideration with any woman. Even those who try to live above them are nevertheless bored to death by them.
If Barbara would acquire a reliable working theory of dress let her put a plain question to herself:
Is Barbara vain? Are clothes the one big reason why she works?
Then she will never discover a way of dressing on any income, limited or unlimited!

Is Barbara shallow?
If so, she will be much in the condition of the gambler, the glass of fashion today, a thing of shreds and patches tomorrow.
Or is Barbara bound to find her mate? Are her clothes her manner of attracting and keeping the attention of men?
Then she will have a freakish wardrobe which is just as apt to call down man's criticism and ridicule as his approving smile.

Such questions simplify Barbara's problem. When she goes to shop she has but to decide if the thing she buys is an expression of herself or of somebody else, perhaps of the saleswoman, or of a middle aged man designer a thousand miles away.
For nothing she can do or say expresses a girl's character and individuality so completely as the things she wears. Even a virtue—self-sacrifice, for instance—is often betrayed by a hat two seasons old.

NOTHING SHE CAN DO OR SAY EXPRESSES A GIRL'S CHARACTER AND INDIVIDUALITY SO COMPLETELY AS THE DESIGNING OF HER CLOTHES.

CYNTHIA GREY'S LETTERS

Q.—If a girl has been going with a young man, and they agree to quit, would it be proper for her to invite him to a party or dance she is giving?
A.—Certainly it is proper.

Q.—I am a girl of 24 and have the problem of earthing my own living starting me in the face. I have only a common school education and would like to learn a trade or profession, something I can depend upon in after years. Will you help me decide?
A.—ANXIOUS GIRL.
This is one of the most impossible questions that I ever have to answer. To be successful in a profession or in work of any sort the person must be adapted to that work. His tastes, his personality, his powers of endurance, his health as well as his education must be taken into consideration. So it is impossible to choose a life work for another person, especially when no particulars as to that person's fancies or temperament are given. I might recommend library work to a girl who hated the sight of a book, or nursing to one who fainted at the sight of blood. But generally the range of professions in which women are engaged is so broad nowadays that no woman should have trouble in finding her proper sphere.

Q.—I write to ask what you think is the best remedy in a case like the following: Briefly, the facts are: I am alone in this country with the exception of a married sister, who has been and is pretty good to me; but her husband causes me to worry a good deal at times on account of his nasty behavior. He has never done or said anything out of the way in front of his wife, which goes to show what his intentions are towards me. Fortunately I am able to support myself, so have managed to keep out of his way to a good extent; but whenever the opportunity arises he makes the most objectional proposals and behaves anything but like a man.
He is good to his wife and good to his children, and to all appearances lives happily with his family, so he has some good traits in his character, and I believe he is generally looked upon as a good fellow and don't think he chases after anyone else. I certainly never encouraged him; but repulsed him from the first. I was too disgusted and frightened to complain, and then again I did not like to tell my sister. I suppose I should have done so in the first place, as it probably gave him encouragement to try again. Anyway, I see no excuse for his behavior.

What do you honestly think of a man of this kind, and do you think it would be wise to tell my sister, or shall I wait until he annoys me again? The difficulty is that she has so much faith in him that she would probably not believe my side of the story, and in any case it would raise a big barrier between us. I have nobody here to protect me, and I dare say he trades on that too. I really cannot come to any definite conclusion myself. Sometimes I feel like having him arrested; but the thought of his wife and children get in the way of that, yet I cannot go on with the incessant fear. I am quite sure it would be no use trying to appeal to his "better nature" because he is the type of man who wouldn't understand that.
Please print this letter and answer just what you think is the best way out, and I will endeavor to get him to read it and maybe he will realize that it alludes to him and drop his foolishness.
Thanking you in anticipation, I am,
PUZZLED.

Q.—If a man has no respect for himself or his wife's feelings, it seems that his little children ought to be a strong enough appeal to make him want to set the best possible example for them. The attitude of parents reflects upon the characters of growing children more than most people dare to suppose. It is barely possible that anything I could say would change four brother-in-law if he did chance to read the letter. Words seldom phase an insolent, worldly man. The rebounding stone is the only hope for his cure.
You used good judgment not to tell your sister if she can get to show what his intentions are towards me. Fortunately I am able to support myself, so have managed to keep out of his way to a good extent; but whenever the opportunity arises he makes the most objectional proposals and behaves anything but like a man.
He is good to his wife and good to his children, and to all appearances lives happily with his family, so he has some good traits in his character, and I believe he is generally looked upon as a good fellow and don't think he chases after anyone else. I certainly never encouraged him; but repulsed him from the first. I was too disgusted and frightened to complain, and then again I did not like to tell my sister. I suppose I should have done so in the first place, as it probably gave him encouragement to try again. Anyway, I see no excuse for his along with him and raise her family. I would say to you, get away from him and stay away. If you can support yourself you are just as safe or more so at the hands of the wide world than you are in the house of a man as insulating as your sister's husband. If you haven't already a position, get one, and a place to board as far away from your present surroundings as possible. Then you can arrange to go and see your sister only when she is home, and thus avoid your present difficulty for her husband would hardly dare to insult you outside of his house, and if he does, set the law on his heels. No girl can afford to sacrifice her own good name to keep peace in a family.

Q.—We are four girls who are invited to attend a surprise party on a young man. Can you suggest something that would make a suitable gift that we could buy together?
A.—COLLEGE GIRLS.
A.—A tennis racket.

And when a woman complains that her gowas are all failures, it must be that she has neither ambitions nor emotions to express!

The Sunday school of Our Savior's Lutheran church, So. J and 17th sts., will give a program and concert next Friday evening in the church parlors, under the auspices of the Sunday school teachers. The following soloists will participate: Mrs. Charles Evans, Miss Goldie Hoffman, Miss Helen Bagley, Miss Ethel Miller, Miss Adelle Pendergast, and Mrs. Blanche Brown.
