Confessions of a Wife

(Copyright, 1914, by Newspaper Enterprise Association)

As usual when Jim and I have danced at Eliene's the others stopped and looked on. I have never known as fine a dancer as Jim, and some way it seems like floating on air when I am dancing with him. All our friends laugh at us and ask us when we are going to make our debut professionally.

"Oh dear," I exclaimed, "I wish Dick danced as well as you, Jim."

"I don't," answered Jim promptly.

"Why not?"

"Because then you would be dancing with him all the time and I would not have my splendid dancing partner at all."

"Do you know, Jim, I think it is rather strange that Dick and I don't dance better together." I said innocently, "he seems to dance with Eleanor Fairlow perfectly."

Jim laughed and then said, "My dear Margie, you evidently do not know that in all their lives neither Eleanor Fairlow nor Dick have danced with anyone else but each other. While they were at school if any other boy looked at Eleanor Dick was perfectly furious and Eleanor was quite as jealous of Dick."

"Eleanor has all the faults in dancing that Dick has, but they suit each other perfectly as they have in reality been dancing partners ever since they went to the first children's dancing school."

"I must have been rather a surprise to all of Dick's friends, Jim."

"You were, my dear child, you were. None of us had ever thought of him without thinking that he and Eleanor would marry and set down some day, and then like lightning from a clear sky we saw dance with Eleanor Fairlow perfectly."

her also losing her money. If I were she I think I'd try to make Master Dick pay in some way. As it looks now she is the only one who is paying.

Do you know, little book, I'd like Eleanor Fairlow if she would let me, particularly since she has become a nurse. She has shown me some splendid traits of character. And you can't get over loving somebody all at once. The habit of loving is like every other habit—hard to break. Poor girl—poor girl.
