A Thanksgiving Story
 By Alice Louise Lee.

Copyright, 1908, by American Press Association.

TEN minutes before the 8:40 train left the Union station Thanksgiving morning a young woman in a dark green suit took possession of the first section in the rear Pullman and proceeded to make herself comfortable.

It was Harriet Stillwell, runaway spinster, known to her Vassar mates—and to a few others—as Harry the Dilatory, because before committing herself to any course she looked at it long and thoroughly from all sides.

"My first celebration of Thanksgiving alone," she confided to her mirror, intending the thought to be a happy one, but instead she found it accompanied by a sigh. This certainly was not logical, and Harriet had prided herself until recently on her logic.

Settling back in her seat, animated by a grim determination to enjoy herself, she turned her attention to the scene outside.

The train, westbound on the Rio Grande road, stood before the Union station in Denver, and the first thing her eyes lighted on was a pair of elk's antlers branching majestically over a load of express trundled across the pavement.

"Oh," she exclaimed aloud, "what beauties!"

She pressed her face against the pane to watch them out of sight. "Ray promised me a pair two years ago, but—well, it's quite like a man to forget!"

But it was not like Ray, and she knew it. Ray had never forgotten a promise to her. She thought of a dozen which he had fulfilled to the letter, but how inconsiderate of memory to choose this of all days wherein to distract her attention when she had been anticipating eagerly her first sight of the Royal gorge! Then she fell to wondering how many guests Ray was having to dinner that day in his bachelor apartments.

In the section opposite the porter was stowing away two suit cases suspiciously new in appearance. Behind him stood the owners, also suspiciously new as to dress. The lady, who was no longer young, wore a suit of gray, a gray hat with a white veil and gray gloves. The man also wore gray—dark gray—from the rim of hair visible beneath his hat to his brand new fashionable cut trousers.

The porter straightened himself, closing his hand over a silver piece with a "Thank you, sah, thank you!" and retired, grinning. Presently the Pullman conductor sauntered in, pulled his mustache and looked knowing, while the passengers gradually awoke to the fact that the wonderful Royal gorge would have a rival in the interests of the day.

As for Harriet, she distinctly disapproved of the open delight which the couple opposite took in their own society, maintaining that ten years of wedded life alone give married people the right to devote themselves to each other in public. "And at the end of ten years they never care to!" thought this runaway spinster, with a glance as scornful as her soft eyes could express. "How glad I am that I have escaped a wedding trip!"

With this Thanksgiving declaration her lips set themselves firmly, but her eyes grew wistful as she fell again into a reverie, going over certain reasons she had gone over so many times before, perfectly logical, but she was not at all sure they satisfied her. That was the trouble, if only she could be sure—

"Sleeper tickets, please!" demanded the conductor.

She produced her ticket, at the same time asking, "Is the upper berth of this section taken, conductor?"

"Yes, ma'am, by a gentleman."

"Ah—thank you." Then the murmur, caught only by the window, "I hope he sees fit to stay in the smoker all day."

ed half in dismay, half in delight, wholly astonished.

But he was not looking at her. His eyes were on the couple across the aisle, and a faint smile flashed across his fine face, a smile of sympathy and not derision, she noticed. Then he reached section 1 and removed his hat.

"I beg—Harry Stillwell, by the gods immortal!"

For an instant they looked at each other in silence, Harriet's eyes—before she got them under control—sparkling and dancing over this unexpected meeting.

Then she laughed outright. "Well, Ray, don't you think we better shake hands?"

"Perhaps." He held his out gravely, and to Harriet the knowledge came with a shock of wonder that the face she could read so well was not expressing unalloyed pleasure at sight of her.

"I thought you were at home, Harry," he remarked, resting his elbow on his knee.

"You thought I was at home!" echoed Harriet blankly. "Why, Raymond Merrill! Where have you been all this time?" Her eyes were under control now.

Ray leaned over and rubbed at a spot on the window. "Let's see, I went to North Woods in—August, wasn't it?"

Yes, it was directly after the evening when they had their last talk, such a logical talk—on her part—she considered it. She nodded and allowed a distant view of Pike's Peak to absorb her attention.

"Well, I've not been back since then—scarcely heard from home, in fact." (Then he did not even suspect she was running away from him! She felt unaccountably defrauded.) "I've been all over the west, fishing and hunting. By the way, Harry, I just shipped a pair of elk's antlers back to you from Denver. If you remember, I promised them to you long ago."

She leaned forward eagerly. "Oh, Ray, I do believe I saw them on the platform! They are beauties. Thank you, I can scarcely wait until I get home to have them put up."

Again she was struck by his strange reserve. Three months ago his face would have glowed over her enthusiastic thanks.

The groom's head lay against the back cushions very near his bride's. He was speaking low, and she was smiling and pulling at her gray muff.

Quite illogically the sight brought a lump into Harriet's throat. They were silly, of course, to act that way—but if only Ray would be his old self! Then she strangled the thought and took a fresh hold of herself.

"And you?" Ray was saying.

"Oh, I!" Her tone was lightly flippant. "Why, I've been—since August—rambling too. Can't say I've hunted, but I've fished and ridden and explored from northern Montana to here."

"What for?"

Harriet's chin went up, and her tone became more flippant. "What a queer question! But if you want reasons, fortunately I can control the price of a few railroad tickets. Being past twenty-five and accounted discreet, I can travel alone. I intend to see the west, and I love my independence."

The last assertion escaped her involuntarily. She stopped abruptly and bit her lip. But Ray did not wince. He merely looked at her intently.

"Harry, I believe I can sympathize with you in that independence business. I've been enjoying a taste of independence myself for the first time in seven years."

Harriet looked her amazement. Raymond Merrill was a very model of independence to his friends—Independent of family ties, independent in income, in health, in habits. "What do you mean?" she inquired directly.

less smile, and looked at her. Then he hesitated, studying the people in the opposite section. "I never intended to tell you, Harry. It's unfortunate I should meet you just now!"

He stopped. Impulsively Harriet filled in the pause. "I thought you did not appear glad to see me."

"No," he returned frankly, "I was not—am not glad. I remember you always balance your ledger with Providence on Thanksgiving day and count your mercies. This meeting is so far from being among mine that I intend to leave the train at Glenwood Springs this evening—get away from you, in short."

"Why, Raymond Merrill!" The girl's breath was taken away. To run away from Ray, that seemed to have been her duty in August, but to have Ray run away from her, why, it was unthinkable!

"It sounds harsh, I know," the man went on steadily, "but you asked for an explanation and," obstinately, "I intend to make it in all its baldness. But as I don't care to shout it into the face of a car full I'll take the liberty of sitting beside you."

He suited his action to the word, and Harriet's fingers laced themselves together with spasmodic strength as he spoke close to her ear.

"Let's see, Harry. It's just seven years ago today that I gave my first bachelor Thanksgiving dinner, and you were there. Do you remember?"

She nodded mutely.

"From that day to—well, our last talk, I have known no independence of my will. I have served for you faithfully seven years."

Harriet's finger nails pressed into her palms, and her breath came irregularly. He went on:

"It was my study and work to win you, and to that end I ordered my life. You were worth it, Harry, had seven years won you, I have no word of blame for you, I'm not discussing your side of the situation now, but my own."

The girl beside him remembered, with a pang of regret.

"I'm merely trying to get at this. Up in the woods last August I determined that my happiness should no longer be dependent on you."

Ray suddenly broke off and looked at her. Her eyes wavered and fell before his. Down in her throat was a sob she was striving to keep there. For the first time the man's voice softened.

"You'll think it harsh, but I have set out to tell you the whole truth about my new determination. I have thought you the sweetest woman God ever made, but in order to achieve my independence I am unthinking that—the sob forced itself high in Harriet's throat—"and I fully intend!"

Again he broke off and glanced across the aisle. The bride was looking into her husband's eyes with a face brimming over with love and trust. Ray drew a long breath, and his voice faltered when he spoke again.

"I want a home, not endless bachelor apartments, and love returned as well as given, and when I've achieved my independence I shall seek them—again." He ended abruptly, with a little gesture across the aisle.
