They told me he made a pitiful sight, wheedling and whining among the legislators. But he degraded himself to some purpose. He succeeded in rallying round him enough members to deadlock the party caucus for a month—members from the purely rural districts, where the sentiment of loyalty is strongest, where his piety and unselfish devotion to the party were believed in, and his significance as a "statesman." I let this deadlock continue—41 for Dunkirk, 41 for Schoolcraft—until I felt that the party throughout the state was heartily sick of the struggle. Then Woodruff bought, at $12,000 apiece, two Dunkirk men to vote to transfer the contest to the floor of a joint session of the two houses.

After four days of balloting there, seven Dominick-Croft men voted for me—my first appearance as a candidate. On the seventy-seventh ballot Schoolcraft withdrew, and all the Dominick-Croft men voted for me. On the seventy-ninth ballot I got, in addition, two opposition votes Woodruff had bought for me at $800 apiece. The ballot was: Dunkirk, 41; Grassmere (who was receiving the opposition's complimentary vote), 36; Saylor, 43. I was a senator of the United States.

There was a wild scene. Threats, insults, blows even, were exchanged. And down at the Capital City hotel Dunkirk crawled upon a table and denounced me as an infamous ingrate, a traitor, a serpent he had warmed in his bosom. But the people of the state accepted it as natural and satisfactory.
