Better Home Life on the Farm.
—Crystallization of public sentiment in favor of better home life on the farm and the organization of the forces for its attainment, is the object of the congress of farm women to be held in Colorado Springs during the week of October 16th, in connection with the International Dry Farming congress.
"Better Farming" has been the slogan of the Dry Farming congress since its organization, and a tremendous amount of work has been done along this line. Now a new feature is presenting itself, and "better and more attractive home life" has been added to the problems which are demanding their earnest attention.
Theodore Roosevelt, that remarkable leader of men, while President of the United States, appointed the American Country Life commission, an unofficial body of men who devoted several months to investigating the conditions upon the American farm. In submitting the report off that commission to congress, the president created a new line of thought for the people of this great country by placing before the congress a few significant and characteristically forceful statements as to the necessity for concerted and continued effort for the uplift of American home life.
"The men and women on the farms stand for what is fundamentally best and most needed in our American life," said he. "Crop growing is the essential foundation of successful country life, but it is no less essential that the farmer and his wife and children should lead the right kind of lives. One of the chief difficulties in giving to the life on the farm all the dignity, desirability and business results that the farmers might easily give to their vocation if they chose, is the failure of country life, as it now exists, to satisfy the higher social and intellectual aspirations of the country people."
During the few years of its working existence, the Dry Farming congress has labored to establish higher aims on the part of farmers in the production of better quality of crops, better acreage results, the use of better seed and implements, as well as better business methods—in brief, the mixture of brains with soil.

The Dry Farming congress membership, numbering as it does nearly fourteen thousand of the most progressive farmers, professors, experimentalists, and the heads of educational institutions, as well as, in many nations, the actual executive heads of the agricultural departments, has felt more and more each year that the "back to the farm" movement so much discussed must be organized and encouraged, and that public sentiment must be focused in an effective manner upon the various phases of the subject.
With this in mind, there were a number of notable addresses upon the subject of rural education and agricultural college and extension work before the Fifth International Dry Farming congress at Spokane last fall, and, with a determination to lead in the wonderful uplift movement already under way, the international governors of the congress, co-operating with the Colorado board of control of the sixth congress, has authorized the calling of the very first international convention of farm women ever held in America, if not in the world.
This convention, while an auxiliary to the Dry Farming congress, is to be known as the International Congress of Farm Women, and the initial session will convene in Colorado Springs, Colo., Monday evening, October 16. If letters already received from many of the leading educational workers of the states, east and west, and from many women leaders, are a criterion, the first of Farm Women will be a brilliant and notable affair, and will be a great impetus to the already remarkable Dry Farming congress movement.
The day of the old-fashioned "farmer type is past, and the "book farmer" is recognized as a business element to be reckoned with as a commercial and political factor, and it is as true that the day of the old-fashioned "drudge of a wife" at the farmer's home should be ended. The average convention of farmers now contains a large percentage of college-bred men, former school teachers, retired merchants, a few retired lawyers, and newspaper men, and the average farming community contains many women whose attainments would admit of their mingling with the best of society in the city—women who are competent to take hold of social and religious work intelligently and successfully in any community, and yet—the spirit of commercialism has been so dominant upon the farm, as elsewhere, that the average farm home is not conducive to the development of the finer things of life—sentiment, the music, the art, the love for literature, the little social amenities that would fill the lives of these very same people were they within easy access to the circles where custom demands certain observances and establishes certain habits of thought and conduct.
And yet, where could one more nearly attain to spiritual and physical perfection than in God's great beautiful country, where the air is pure, sweetened with the perfume of the freshly turned soil or the flower of the crop, where the study of the science of life is from leaves forever opening at some new picture—in the midst of the great miracles of creation and reproduction.
To the drudge of the farm home, even to the old type of farmer, all this meant nothing. Farm life meant staying where one had been planted to work out the problems of everyday existence—mostly because one was unfitted for anything else—a mere getting through one day and the preparation for another just as long, just as wearing, and just as monotonous.
A favorable season meant good crops and a few trifles of added comfort and pleasure. An unfavorable year meant a little more scrimping on the part of the wife and mother, a little more hard work and worry for the farmer, and less educational opportunity for the boy and girl—the cutting out of frills. Altogether the old rule of the three Rs was quite sufficient, provided the "readin' ritin' and rithmetic" were accompanied by sufficient clothing and food to make life possible.
But, today, the farmer is a thinker, as well as a worker; a scientist and experimenter more than the follower after customs now obsolete; the manager rather than the drudge. Not that the farm is free from drudgery, but that drudgery is lessened by the application of methods that have established farming upon a specialty basis—as a business proposition as accurately to be measured as any other line of human endeavor. The farmer no longer goes at his work "haphazard." He knows why he gets results or failures, and he knows—or should know—how he made or lost upon his crops or stock. He knows what he is worth in dollars and cents, and is able to plan with a reasonable degree of certainty the future of his farm and his family.
The agricultural colleges, the great factor in the improvement of agriculture; the federal and state departments' experts and the intelligently engendered as a result of the thousands of local organizations among farmers, known by various official titles; the great conventions those interested in agricultural development; the well-edited agricultural journals which in themselves are a power for good, and the movements like the Dry Farming congress, are to be credited with a new condition of affairs that is bringing into rural districts—but which change in the farm must come from within the home, a new atmosphere which will make for the farmer, men, the boys and girls, and give them a different life.

Granges and similar organizations had existed before this congress made its investigation and Home-making societies and science movements were under way and men and women students of logical conditions were thinking of the necessity of better things for the farmer's family. It was well known that great manufacturing institutions were finding that to keep the best help and get the best work, it was well to give them, to insist upon neatness and order. A certain building company had proved that keeping interior of the steel painted white, the handles of tools cleaned and whitened, the windows and yards clean and sanitary, the men were led to better order, cleaner personal habits, better workmanship. The truth had long before shown that to encourage their men to spend spare hours in railroad Y. M. C. club houses, reading or listening to clean entertainments, they had objectionable habits and inefficiency. Even the roughest workers who for many years looked upon as the tag end of imperfection, when organized by Y. M. C. A., and other where the atmosphere encouraged better thoughts, education and progressive lives, soon became a different class of men. Even those who existed that organized movements, the improvement of men and women in every walk of life were success factors in creating a new life. The report of the Country commission brought to mind that all these factors were not but slowly in the rural districts cause of disorganization in men.

"What is needed in the country," said the commission, "Young men and women, trained in this work of organization and uplift, and willing to devote their lives to the betterment of their men and women."
There is need, the evidence of a new regime when the first thinks first of his wife and children of his home rather than his stock. Recently, a great conference of farmers was held in central Montana. One speaker had just given an excellent paper on "The Home Money Maker," when a snappy, middle-aged farmer, whose personal showed that he was interested in higher things of life, arose and permission to speak for a moment upon "Money Making as a Home Proceeded to draw a picture could be found upon hundreds of thousands of farms, and closed the homely, but rather significant statement: "The great trouble some farmers is that they pay attention to breeding up fine and hogs than they do to breeding children that they can be proud of."
And now the movement for building is to be crystallized, great congress as powerful, in its work for humanity as the Farming congress which is bringing it into existence. The men and women of all the world will be invited to assemble at the foot of Mt. Old Pike's Peak next October to formulate plans for a world-wide campaign for the ideals of better and more perfect living upon the farm; to discuss ethical nursing, beautification of the home, and nature, literary, musical and sporting, the care of the children, art of dressing economically, tastefully, home amusements, try social movements, and a hundred other things that will make home attractive and profitable every member of the family. At the same time the methods by which wives and children can assist in the farm more profitably, bookkeeping to be done in a simple and profitable ventures for the men who desire to establish a national personal bank account through special gardens, fruits, flowers, will be discussed.

The detail of the organization will be placed in the hands of Mrs. T. Burns, who for four years has been associated with the Dry Farming congress and is well acquainted with organization work. A national convention will soon be announced.
