

AMUSEMENTS

"LANKY BOB'S" WIFE AS POPULAR AS FIGHTER

"Lanky Bobby" may thank his lucky stars that he has such a pretty, clever little wife, for she helps out his vaudeville stunt wonderfully. She has a very sweet and well cultivated voice, and she makes a big hit. Although she wears a large quantity of jewels, this does not seem to displease the audience a bit. Two crowded houses saw the former heavyweight champion of the world at the Pantages last evening, and they were quite satisfied with his performance. Of course the chief thing they wanted was just a look at the man who really had a genuine knockout punch—something that might few fighters have. They got the look, they heard him speak a little piece, and they saw him punch the bag a few minutes. In addition, they saw and admired his intelligent and pretty wife. Pantages show this week is very good. In fact, the theater has had three or four weeks of unusually good vaudeville headliners, beginning with the cowboy act, and including the canine actors. One of the things you don't want to miss is the female impersonator. He'll surprise you. Best in his line ever seen here. There are two or three other good acts, including "The Taming of Eleanor."

GOOD BILL AT WASHINGTON

Do you remember "The Traveling Man," the snappy comedy novelty picturing the mishaps of a couple of parlor car passengers, presented her last season by Searl and Violet Allen? Remember how it kept the audience shouting with

Our July Clearance Sale Continues Tomorrow

Our sale is a grand success. It started off Saturday much better than we expected. This goes to show that the people of Spokane know real bargains when they see them and are wise enough to grasp an opportunity that is as exceptional as these bargains. For tomorrow we have some fine bargains, which were not advertised before.

Children's Coats at One-Half Price.

We have a fine line of children's coats, made of pique, rep and serge materials. They are just the thing for the little ones this weather. They are not so heavy but what they are easy to take along, and yet they are heavy enough to protect from the chill evening air.

- $3.00 coats on sale tomorrow at $1.50
$4.00 coats on sale tomorrow at $2.00
$5.00 coats on sale tomorrow at $2.50
$6.00 coats on sale tomorrow at $3.00

Also Children's Capes

We have a lot of children's capes for summer and fall wear also, which we will close out at cost and less. They come in blue and red flannel, and are very serviceable as well as neat and tasty. Values up to $5.50 we will close out during this sale at, choice, $2.95. All summer garments are being closed out at very low prices—dresses, suits, millinery, fine waists, etc., etc. In fact, almost everything for ladies and misses to wear may be purchased here at a great saving.

Note—Look for our ads in The Press. We will have some interesting news for the readers of The Press at least three times each week. Form the habit of looking for and reading every one of them. It will pay you well to do so, as every one of them will be as full of good bargains as a nut is of meat.

YOUNGEST CANDIDATE

John P. Stanford is the most youthful looking of the several candidates for justice of the peace, John, however, is older than he looks, as he will be 27 in November. He is a graduate of the University of Washington, and has been practicing law in Spokane for four years. He has lived in Spokane 12 years, is married and has one son.

Stanford says that he is tied up with no clique or ring and that if elected he will give all a square deal. He is one of the most energetic hustlers in the race, and has the city covered with his placards.

30,000 VISIT NATATORIUM

"Outside of the Fourth of July, yesterday was the heaviest day of the season," said R. A. Wilson, general superintendent of railways of the Washington Water Power Co., speaking of the travel to Natatorium park Sunday afternoon. "Since 10 o'clock Sunday morning we maintained a one minute car service to the park, and between 3 and 4 o'clock carloads of persons were received at the park on the average of every 50 seconds."

Our storage track at the park, which holds 30 cars, was empty at 9:30 Sunday evening, and every car was hitting the high places between the park and the city. I believe that no company could give better car service than did the Washington Water Power Co. yesterday, and then, too, there were six extra trains on the Medical lake line, and that service, too, was up to the water power company's standard in every respect."

Early in the day crowds began gathering at Natatorium park in anticipation of the great combined band concert of the afternoon, and when Liberatori stepped in front of the 70 musicians to begin the first number, the waiting crowds applauded him and his organization to the echo. This evening program: Part I: "Military No. 1," Schubert. Ballet music from "Coppelia," Debussy. Contralto solo, Selected, Miss Deaubrey. Overture, "Il Guarany," Gomez. March, "The Marines," Brooks. Part II: Overture, "La Secret de la Reine," Thomas. "Funiculi Funiculi," Denza. Selected, "The Forge in the Forest," Michaels. Cornet solo, "La Prima Donna," by Sig. Liberatori. Liberatori. Selection, "Aida."

HEAVENS! "LITTLE EVA" ACCUSED OF SHOPLIFTING

(By United Press Leased Wire) NORTH YAKIMA, July 25.—"Little Eva," that innocent and lovable child of southern parentage, who millions have seen ascend to Heaven with the aid of a slender wire and a husky stage hand, spent a portion of last night in the county jail charged with shoplifting.

This time "Little Eva" was Mrs. Stella Moroney, who does "juveniles" in a one-night stand troupe which played here last night. Her arrest came shortly before "making up" time. Chief of Police Kinman discovered four women's back combs valued at $25, which she was accused of purloining from a local store, in her handbag. She was locked up but released later when the merchant refused to prosecute her.

But in the meantime the play had gone on and Little Eva had been portrayed by a male member whose voice squeaked exasperatingly.

(By United Press Leased Wire) SEATTLE, July 25.—The sound steamer Bode, which ran aground at Marrowstone point last Thursday and has been battered by storms and tide rips since, has been abandoned and will be sold to the highest bidder as she lies.

Up in Detroit the bugs are betting 3 to 2 the Tigers won't finish better than third. They figure New York and the Athletics will beat Jennings' gang out.

The Game and The Candle

(Continued.) "Of my protection! You, now?" "I, now. Through you, if you lend your name to their use, my enemies can make the task I have set myself difficult beyond description."

The kindling fire had caught, at last; with the first boyish impulsiveness of the interview Adrian's response flashed to meet the appeal. "You need not fear that! You need not fear me."

"Thank you, sire," Stanief answered, simply and gravely. "There was a pause. Allard wondered, as he discreetly observed the two, just what would have been the result if Stanief had brought less convincing seriousness to answer his cousin's sensitive pride and incredulity."

"I have come alone," Adrian mused, with a half sigh, "with Gregor. He does what I wish because he knows Dalmorov hates him and he is afraid to stand alone. So when I bade him bring me here secretly tonight, after I had presumably retired, he obeyed. I like to be obeyed." The expression of several moments before returned transiently.

A playfully earnest warning of the other cousin's recurred to the listener; it appeared that both had "the habit of domination." "And so I must return at once, or they may discover I have gone. But I am glad I came, cousin; it seems easier now."

"Sire," Stanief said, and somehow his tone made Allard feel suddenly abashed, as one who stands before a thing not for his eyes, "there will come a day when you will stand in the great cathedral to receive the oaths of allegiance of your nobles. There will be all ceremony, all solemnity, but—take mine now. The one I shall give you then can mean no more. You have been taught to have no faith in such promises; when you receive mine for the second time, I hope it will have gained some value in your sight."

"I wish it had now; I almost think it has," he answered, with a bitterness and energy singularly strange from his boyish lips. "I want to have faith in you, cousin." He rose, and Stanief with him. "I care for nothing," he added, reverting to the previous invitation. "I have already stayed too long. Monsieur," his eyes went to Allard for the first time, "monsieur is the American gentleman who sailed with you from New York?" Allard came forward in response to a glance from Stanief.

"Sire, I have the honor to present Monsieur John Allard, whom I have persuaded to come with me because I also have need of one friend whom I can trust."

He was after all so pathetic in his lonely and sophisticated youth, this child. Saluting him, Allard's clear gray eyes involuntarily expressed all their sympathy and warm kindness. And, meeting the regard, Adrian gave him his only smile of the evening.

"It is easy to trust you others, Monsieur Allard," he said wistfully. "I wish you were my friend instead of Feodor's." "Is it not the same thing, sire?" Allard questioned. "Is it?" "I sincerely believe so, sire."

"Bring Monsieur Allard with you tomorrow, cousin," Adrian directed, lifting his gaze to Stanief. "And good night." "You will allow me to accompany your return, sire?" "Certainly not—to attract all the capital!" "Pardon, I meant as secretly as Gregor attends you; who—again pardon me—is scarcely attendance enough."

Adrian shook his head decisively. "You: people on the yacht—?" "They are not already aware that your imperial majesty is here?" "You can order them to be silent," he retorted, with angry irritation.

"Exactly, sire," said Stanief, and waited. Adrian was nothing if not swift of thought; he drew the inference intended and conceded the point. "Very well," he yielded. "As you will, cousin. Good night, Monsieur Allard."

He held out his hand, and quite unconsciously Allard took the little fingers in his warm clasp. Stanief, holding aside the curtain, smiled to himself; but Adrian accepted the Americanism equably and his last glance was all friendly.

It was three o'clock in the morning when Stanief re-entered the Nadeja's salon. Allard was still there, and rose expectantly to receive him. "I waited," he explained. "You need not have," Stanief replied, with all his usual cool serenity. "Go and rest; tomorrow the battle opens. Only—"

"Only, monsieur?" He came over to the table to find the tiny gold tipped cigrars. "Only it was not with you I played chess tonight, John, but with Dalmorov and the later emperor, my uncle. And I claim check."

CHAPTER VIII. Too Meet the Emperor.

There are some periods which offer to the backward glance of memory rather a lurid of blended color than a distinct picture, a rich and shining tapestry in which no one thread can be distinguished. So allusion to Allard seemed that first look in the country he learned to call home. The stately ceremonies of Stanief's reception and assumption of the regency; the dazzle and pageantry of the court even when thus subdued by mourning; his own sudden importance as the favorite of the actual sovereign, all merged into a glittering confusion through which he moved automatically.

But there were two incidents which detached themselves from the bright background and always remained with him. The first was the first morning when Stanief formally met the emperor at the palace; and, as he had stooped to the salute, Adrian had deliberately given him an embrace so markedly affectionate that even Allard felt the significant thrill that ran through the room. And then, even while the unusual color still flushed Stanief's dark cheek, Adrian shot a glance at a sharp faced man opposite, a glance so sneering, so bitterly triumphant, that the straightforward American actually shrank from the revelation of dual thought. Evidently the embrace was given less to please Stanief than to annoy this other. Seeing the man's rigidly held face beneath the ordeal, he knew without question that this was the Baron Dalmorov, whose desire in life was to prevent this very friendship between the cousins.

BARNUM, BAILEY CIRCUS AUG. 15

Advertising car No. 1 of the Barnum & Bailey show came to town at an early hour this morning, with a brigade of 35 men on board, and they were not long in making their presence known. The billboards throughout the city and surrounding country are taking on a gaudy dress of flaring circus posters, announcing the appearance of this show in Spokane, at the show grounds opposite Recreation park, August 15. Between now and the circus date, three more advertising cars will come along at short intervals, and with them more than a hundred men, who will devote their energies to booming the event.
