

THE WOMEN'S CORNER

Cynthia Grey's After-Supper Talks.

The Inquisitive Person and the Flirt were having tea. "I wonder—" said the Inquisitive Person. "Don't," said the Flirt; "ask me." "You don't know, because you are not constant. I am wondering why it is that good women go on loving worthless men and keeping it up year after year until youth and hope and everything that goes with them are dead and gone." "Well, I may not be so specially good," said the Flirt, "but I am wise enough to tell you that; and I am too wise to waste my life that way. It is a great misfortune to be born with an imagination; that is what causes all the trouble." "I don't see what imagination has to do with it," said the Inquisitive Person. "Of course you don't," retorted the Flirt, "but you are going to see. Good women are just crazy about reforming people—especially men. A good woman never sees a man going to the bad without wanting to bring him back to the 'straight and narrow.' She sees him, not as he is, but as she fancies he would be if he were under the influence of her love. She has imagination plus, and that keeps her working overtime in her mind thinking of how that man will be when he is deeply in love with her and reforms on account of that love. You see, the imagination keeps her from seeing him as he really is, and it takes her a few decades to discover that there is nothing about him worth saving. "She blames herself every time he makes a slip, and says to herself: 'If only I were more lovable or if I had done this or that, he would not have slipped,' and she sees him all the time as she fancies he will be when he is perfected by her love. "I am not strong on contemplating tragedies," continued the Flirt, "but I've seen enough of that kind of thing to make me thank my stars that I know enough about men in general not to waste time trying to make them over." "But," remonstrated the Inquisitive Person, "it is a very beautiful thing to save people." "Yes, I know," said the Flirt, with a yawn, "but folks were meant to do that job for themselves. I'm looking for a man who is strong enough to do his own work. He won't need any reforming."

SASHES POPULAR ON EVENING FROCKS

There's no doubt about the value of the new sashes as additions to one's party array. A last season's frock is transformed into a thing of beauty with the aid of a soft broad satin ribbon sash with long tasseled ends. Many of the new gowns are made with Puritan simplicity except for the draped sashes that are used. Not all the sashes of this season are passed round the waist in the old-time manner. Some begin upon one shoulder, and, having been carried to the waist, are folded half round it and left to fall in a single end or series of loops of different lengths. Others never appear outside the frock, but are imprisoned by the tunic veiling. Another type of sash forms a train; it is very broad and flat, and actually covers the back of the dress, falling from between the shoulders or from the waistline to the hem of the skirt.

Electrical Advice

There are a good many "little wrinkles" in the arrangement of lights and switches that make a tremendous difference in the lighting of a house, and these differences mean more comfort, more convenience, more pride in your home, more thorough, lasting satisfaction. Like every other ingenious scheme, most of these little tricks are simple and mean no added expense to the installation.

The advice of our engineers is free.
