DEATH WAS CAUSED BY RARE DISEASE

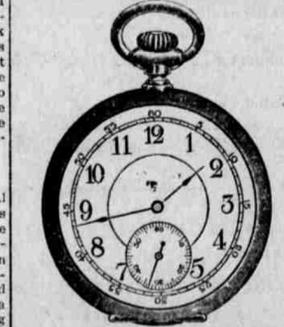

That Clarence Bowers, the young man who was buried yesterday, died of a disease of which there are but 41 similar cases on record in the medical world is the statement of physicians who attended the young man. The cause of death was what English doctors called latent uraemia. It differs from the ordinary uraemia of which there are many cases in that there is a total and complete suppression of the kidneys. In the usual cases, there is only a partial suppression. Death is inevitable in latent uraemia and usually occurs between eight and fourteen days. In the case of young Bowers, the suppression lasted for eight days before death ensued. From Tuesday of last week until Wednesday of this week, his bladder had been absolutely dry, according to Dr. E. O. Parker, who had charge of the case. Life was prolonged by the use of hot packs which enabled the patient to rid himself of some of the fluid excretion. However, the refusal of the kidneys to perform their functions caused the accumulation and diffusion of much uric acid and death was only a matter of time.

When the young man was brought to the local hospital, it was found that he was suffering from appendicitis and an operation was decided upon. However, when the patient developed symptoms of uraemia, the idea of the surgical treatment was abandoned inasmuch as it would tend to aggravate the other trouble.
