MUCH IN LITTLE

By Dewey M. Owens

Hearst's Sunday American carries a big picture showing John D. Rockefeller chatting with a group of Palm Beach golf caddies, who are described as about the most penniless youngsters in America. The little caddies are envying Mr. Rockefeller his great wealth; he their abounding store of health and energy. And it must be admitted that the caddies have all the best of the bargain on their side with their health and the reasonable expectation of years piled on years of life and activity. The aged Standard Oil magnate, technically the richest man on earth is forced to scrimp and save even the pennies of health. Daily under the care of physicians he eats, exercises and sleeps only by prescribed rules, wearing heavy clothes through the heat of summer to conserve the failing warmth of his body and ward off the inevitable dissolution.

After thinking of this one can't wonder at the contented faces of the penniless caddies and the grim, mummy like countenance of the richest man on earth.

The Temps, the leading newspaper of Paris, France, is quoted as declaring that the discovery of America did nothing to help the human race. The Temps in its wisdom might remember the discovery at least made the continued existence of France possible.

Col. George Harvey, our ambassador to England, is again in the newspapers with a characteristic fool statement. This time Col. George calmly declared that women have no souls and are consequently not bound by the ten commandments. The worthy gentleman has evidently forgotten that the ladies now have votes and would know how to use them if Col. Harvey ever bobs up as a candidate for office.

In a speech at Knoxville Monday Isaac Marcossan, the noted interviewer, told a story of David Lloyd George which aptly illustrates the almost uncanny quickness of mind of the little Welchman.

Lloyd George was addressing a meeting of women when a woman in the audience arose and shrieked: "If you were my husband I would poison you."

Quick as a flash Lloyd George retorted: "Yes, madam, and if you were my wife I would gladly take poison."

The former kaiser is quoted as declaring himself the happiest man in the world because of his recent marriage. Young love's sweet dream.

Saturday marks the fourth anniversary of the signing of the armistice which ended the world war. The wild joy that characterized that epoch marking event has disappeared. There was to be no more war, but now talk of the "next war" fills the newspapers. The nations politely promised each other to scrap their battleships, and Uncle Sam junked a few of his only to find out "That nobody, else was doing the same," as Tony, the barber, would say. Now everybody is building bigger guns and bigger ships and inventing more poisonous chemicals, getting ready for the brotherhood of man.

Jazz advertising has penetrated even darkest Africa. Alimany Bungie, the sympathetic undertaker, has placarded his section of the country with the following cheerful message:

"Young man, time is short. Eternity is at hand. He is dead. Are you ready? Eat plenty good food, drink good grog, be praying for a happy death and decent burial."

THE CAVEMAN PASSES

A New York man reverted to type the other day and he did something that has not been considered polite in the best circles for some years. He spanked his wife.

He told the court the spanking was "extremely light" and was such as he would administer to a wayward child. It was to him little more than a joke.

"The cave man stuff is out," replied the judge "and just to prove it, this spanked lady shall have a divorce and you shall pay $30 a week alimony."

Gentlemen who go to see "The Shiek" and other movies favoring the down-trodden male sex should not take these scenarios serious and should restrain their emotions, difficult though it may be.

It should be generally understood by American citizens with spanking proclivities that the old English law under which they have been operating has given way before the onward rush of feminine civilization and is now deader than the Volstead Act in Providence, R. I.

The old English law provided that a man might lawfully chastise his wife with the flat of his hand or with a stick that should be no thicker than his thumb. This was considered a good law when it was passed several hundred years ago, and the flappers flapped more wildly than they do at present, but it was soon found that there was a great difference in the thickness of men's thumbs. Some men had thumbs as thick as baseball bats and so the wives of these gentlemen were out of luck.

The old days when men used to hang their wives on the line and beat them like rugs has gone forever from America. True, in certain parts of Europe this form of exercise is a regularly established feature of the daily dozen.

In fact, in some countries a man is accused of lacking interest in his wife and being bored if he does not knock her down three or four times a day. The reason this has gone out of style in America is that the average American husband would hardly emerge from such an encounter without a trip to the hospital.

Police courts have few cases of wife-beating. When a case of this nature comes before a court, the domestic punch is generally on the other fist. And when a poor little shrimp is beaten up by his wife he gets no sympathy from the court or anybody else.

As for the American caveman he has caved—permanently.—Sunday American.
