Our merchants are receiving their new goods for the fall and winter trade, each boat bringing heavy cargoes from the Eastern cities. Our merchants are a live, energetic people and sell goods as cheap as retailers do in the cities. They can do this because they buy from wholesale men as cheap as city retailers, and because fuel, rents, clerk hire, and all other expenses are lighter than in the city. Then our merchants are not so eager to amass wealth as our city neighbors.

To the Author of "Sad But True."

O thou broken-hearted poet, Who doth mourn for J. and L., With such melancholy wailing, In such touching sad farewell, "Am they went and did they gone, And are thou left to grieve And shed whole quarts of bitter tears And wipe 'em on thy sleeve!" If my friends would but permit me Fain would I bestow, my dear, On thee one huge, red bandanna To wipe away the bitter tear. Great poet, how I pity thee Neither tongue nor pen can tell, 'Cause thou'lt have no rides on horseback Since have gone fair J. and L. But why no horseback riding? Sweetest poet, wilt thou tell? Did they take the horses with them When they went, fair J. and L? Poet, surely it were cruel Leaving thee to pine alone, But how very, very cruel Leaving thee on foot to mourn. Thou wallest in thine agony "No more chasing of the bee!" Poor poet and is even this In thy grief denied to thee? Where are the festive bumble-bees? Have they each and all gone dead? Mayhap after the lamented They have spread their wings and fled. If thou wilt pursue the chase, And canst find no bumble-bee, Poet, why not in its stead Diligently chase the flea? Thou wilt remember J. and L. Thou say'st, and question comes to me, Whist thou'lt remember J. and L. Will J. and L. remember thee? SILLY SALLY SLY.
