The groom is one of our popular young farmers and has also resided here since childhood, where both he and his bride spent their happy school days together, and both have a large circle of friends who wish them nothing but happiness and a long, bright and prosperous future. KEEP HARBEST RECORDS

The value of keeping farm records cannot be overestimated. The farmer who knows the operating costs and the financial results of each farm enterprise is on the road to financial success, for such a knowledge discloses leaks in business operations and displays in an accurate manner the relative profitableness of the various enterprises on the farm. To keep a complete record of every transaction embracing labor, financial accounts, and crop yields will seem at first to be almost wholly impossible, yet it is surprising how the habit of keeping those records will become established if the first record attempted is a simple one. At present a very interesting and profitable record to work upon is a harvest record of the different grain crops. The accompanying form shows how simple such a record is. It can readily be seen that such a record, while it does not constitute a complete record of the cost of the crop, shows the farmer how much it cost to thresh the grain. The value of this record lies in the knowledge obtained regarding farm crops and is the incentive which arises to increase crop yields and to keep more complete records of cropping operations. When the value of the farm record sheet is realized and the habit of keeping records has become established, more complete records will be used, which will place the farm, eventually, upon a strict business basis.
