REALISTIC ACTING.

With a Difference of Opinion as to Who Was Doing the Playing.

Edwin Forrest, a giant in build and strength, was feared by the smaller people of the stage. On one of his "Damon and Pythias" nights the part of Lucullus was assigned to a member of the Selwyn family who was ambitious to shine in the reflected light of the great Forrest.

The rehearsal went along calmly. "Here," said Forrest to his Lucullus, "I seize you."

"Certainly, sir," was the reply of the youngster, who was every moment more and more delighted with his prospect of personal contact with the god of his idolatry.

"Here I put you off in the first entrance," continued the tragedian.

"Quite right, sir," chuckled Selwyn.

THE MIGHTY FORREST LEAPED UPON HIM.

who was much relieved by his progress in the difficult one's favor.

"You must give yourself up to me entirely," next cautioned the master.

"Never fear, sir," Selwyn replied, with a confident smile.

The eventful moment arrived duly. Selwyn was exquisitely dressed for the scene, and his envious associates stood about admiring him. At the cue for his entrance he strode upon the stage in all his beauty of youth and togs.

He spoke his modest speech with assertive emphasis. Suddenly the mighty Forrest leaped upon him with tigerish ferocity, seized him, shook him, threw him violently from side to side, released him only to pounce upon him again with increasing ferocity, swabbed the stage with him, held him at arms' length to a loud accompaniment of applause from the gallery and at last flung him into the entrance whence he had emerged in pride and left him a soiled, sore, perspiring, disheveled, bruised and disgusted heap of humanity—what there was left of him.

"Well, Selwyn," observed one of the company, "I see you have been playing with Forrest."

"No," groaned the poor wretch, struggling to get upon his feet; "Forrest has been playing with me."—George Pomeroy Goodale in Detroit Free Press.

Character.

Character is like bells which ring out sweet music and which, when touched accidentally even, resound with sweet music.—Phillips Brooks.

A Little Too Attentive.

Cuneo is a place whose inhabitants are famous in Italian legend for their Boettian stupidity. On one occasion, it is said, when illuminations were called for to celebrate some great anniversary they illuminated the town at noon, and on another occasion, wishing to pay a special compliment to King Carlo Alberto, they made arrangements for giving him a clean pair of sheets every half hour throughout the night. It is added, however, that his majesty repudiated that attention with adequate and appropriate language.

Then They Must Be.

They were watching the dancers as they went through the various steps of the fascinating figure.

"What superb teeth Miss Higgins has!" exclaimed young Imman as he gazed after the young woman in question.

"Yes," replied the girl jealously, "but they are false."

"False!" cried the man, in surprise. "Why do you think so?"

"Because," said the girl, "she told me that she inherited them from her mother."—Boston Herald.

A Story of the Zoo.

Strange things happen in the zoo if you only gau, dears. We only tell you the bear facts. We wouldn't lion any account. Visits to the zoo have tortoise many things, which we put to good purpose. Why, one day we saw a wolf lion a calf, and then again we have seen the wolves lion their backs with their calves up in the air. But the poor little hippopotamus is suffering terribly. They noticed him growing thin. In fact, he seemed to be tapping away to nothing. They are going to try to cure him by putting upon his hip a pot o' mustard.
