RADIO

VARYING INDUCTANCE OF THE TUNING COIL

How Different Forms of Winding Affect Reception of Long and Short Waves.

Tuning inductances for radio receiving circuits are made in a variety of forms. For short waves, the most commonly used form of inductance is the single layer solenoid, which is nothing more nor less than the common tuning coil, consisting of a single layer of wire wound upon a cylindrical form.

The method used to vary the inductance of a tuning coil is a slide which gives single turn variations or a switch which usually varies the inductance in groups of turns. For very close tuning where even the turn to turn variation is too coarse, a series or shunt in the circuit is necessary.

A closer variation of inductance can be procured by splitting the number of turns in two and winding one-half on a hollow cylindrical tube, and winding the second half on a slightly smaller cylindrical tube of such size that it can easily be slid into the first one. If now, the two coils are connected in series but in such a manner that their magnetic fields interlock, a continuous variation of inductance can be had by moving the coils with respect to each other. Fig. 1 represents the tuning coil—all of the magnetic field in the same direction. Fig. 2 represents approximately the same winding as was used in Fig. 1, but wound on two concentric forms. When the two coils of Fig. 2 are separated the fields of the two coils do not react and the inductance is the sum of the separate inductances of the two individual coils.

As the coils are brought closer together the field of one coil bucks down the coil and the total inductance is decreased. Finally when the winding on the inner cylinder is exactly under the winding on the outer cylinder, the inductance of one coil neutralizes that of the other and the resultant inductance, neglecting leakage, is zero.

A variometer functions exactly as did the two coils shown in Fig. 4. In a variometer, one coil rotates with respect to the other instead of sliding in and out as was the case in Fig. 2. If the windings of a variometer are on a cylindrical surface there will be a large amount of leakage, which decreases the ratio of maximum to minimum wave length to which the variometer will tune. A variometer with windings on a spherical surface and having a small mechanical clearance between rotor and stator will give minimum leakage. There is an excellent variometer on the market at the present time with a so-called "basket" winding. Not only are the windings on a spherical surface, but a cross-section of the winding (see Fig. 3) is such that the distributed capacity is reduced to a minimum. This is accomplished by separating adjacent turns and crossing them at right angles.

This same method of winding inductances is applied to the "spider web" coils. The change in wave length when using "spider web" coils is accomplished by the use of a series of shunt variable condensers since the coils are not as a rule provided with taps.

For longer wave lengths the bank wound coil is used to reduce the distributed capacity in winding multi-layer inductances. Fig. 4 shows how the turns of three-layer bank wound inductances are arranged.

The "duo-lateral" coil is an improvement over the bank wound coil. In a "duo-lateral" winding the conductors in two successive layers are not parallel as they are in the bank winding, but cross each other at an angle. In our estimation basket wound variometers with no shunted capacity are most efficient for short wave tuning while duo-lateral wound coils of large diameter, with a small amount of shunted capacity for tuning, are most efficient for long wave reception.

RADIO SPARKS

Mr. Edison is credited with the discovery that a current existed between a lighted filament and a plate enclosed in a vacuum tube, the great principle involved in the successful amplifiers. More recent work by him in radio development has been prevented by the unfortunate falling of his hearing.

Chilo, a chimpanzee in the Milwaukee zoo, has a radio set especially built for him.

The United States forest service is receiving valuable assistance from radio in fighting forest fires. Through broadcasting information regarding the location of fires much valuable time is saved.

Eight broadcasting stations, costing a total of $1,000,000, will soon be built in Great Britain. The fans will be charged a "listener's fee" of approximately $2.50 a set in order to support the stations, which will be operated by the government.

One of the best-known radio "dead spots" in the Red sea. Ships passing through this region can read no signals from the Aden station, but on leaving it, messages are picked up at full strength.

From the west comes a story of a method to use the telephone overhead wires for radio antenna. This cannot be done, however, with a grounded return circuit such as is found in farmers' lines.

Isn't it a helpless feeling when you have just receiving set and you hear two of your friends giving you a pan over the air phones, and you sit and listen and listen, then listen some more, and you can't do a thing but keep on listening?

The large corporations find it profitable to provide entertainment by means of radio for their employees in isolated places. This may be the solution of keeping the hired girl on the job in the country.

Y. M. C. A. boys camping in Montana found enough specimens of game near their camps to equip several radio sets.

Warnings are again prevalent throughout the country regarding sellers of worthless radio stock.

USEFUL "DON'TS" TO KNOW

Every One of Them is Valuable Advice to the Amateur Radio Operator.

- Don't fail to insulate the antenna.
- Don't place the lightning switch indoors.
- Don't listen-in during a thunder-storm.
- Don't cause interference with other stations.
- Don't try to use a loud speaker with a crystal set.
- Don't run wires parallel in making up receiving sets.
- Don't neglect to read everything available on radio.
- Don't attach ends of antenna to power or telephone poles.
- Don't connect a radio set direct to the electric light circuit.
- Don't forget that tickler coils are not used with crystal detector sets.
- Don't expect to get loud signals with a crystal detector set while using an indoor antenna.
- Don't always blame the broadcasting station. It is sometimes the fault of your own apparatus.
- Annealing Hard Wire. If hard-drawn copper wire is used for connections in the rear of panels, it will break when bent or it is most sure to break upon removal from the fastening. The end of the wire may be annealed by heating it in a flame or by applying a coat of tin or solder. The wire can then be bent several times, without its breaking.
- Help Tube With Magnet. The sensitivity of an audion tube sometimes may be increased by placing a large horseshoe magnet in a certain position so that the poles of the magnet are on each side of the tube. This probably is due to the magnetic effect upon the moving electrons that flow across from the filament to the plate.
- Length of Aerial Wires. A single wire aerial is sufficient, if one at least 75 feet long can be put up. If the aerial is shorter, use two wires, taking the leading-in wire from the far end. If the aerial is to be only 50 feet or less over all, make it a four-wire one, and again take the leading-in wires from the far end.
- Will Stop Jamming. It is proposed to increase the number of available wave lengths for broadcasting by varying some of the many 360 meter stations by 25 or more meters.
