Report on the Sojourn of the "Mound Creek Exploring Party."

Our referee had taken the train for home, hence it remained for us three to investigate and note the beauties of the river, upon whose water we launched the two boats. The captain started ahead with every sign of comfort about him, while the Jr. and the steward, who occupied the smaller but heavier boat, followed his path. In the outset the stream was picturesque, and curiosity was amply repaid after surrounding corners and rocks suddenly. We kept on in this way for some hours and were in high hopes of a successful journey, and with laughter and singing moved along. At 5 o'clock we landed at a place, where a gravel beach gave us promise of the fitness for a hearth, but we were disappointed in not finding fresh water. We however were hungry, and at once pitched our tent and prepared supper, while the steward went off to a farm house to procure milk and water. Our hunger appeased we took a bath in the rippling creek and then started for the bluffs not far off. We traveled around, found me new plants, and being rather tired crept into the tent, where we were soon fast asleep. No mosquitoes bothered us that night and much refreshed we awoke. After a light but good breakfast of cold beans, bread and coffee, the steward took to the small boat, while the capt. and I entered the larger one. We expected a repetition of yesterday's fine weather and good travel, but were soon disappointed. The sun was hot and no wind fanned our sweated brows, while every now and then the boat struck a rock. It was very annoying at least, but patiently we worked on, till in the late afternoon, tired, thirsty and uncomfortable we pitched our tent beneath four strong oak trees, while a hearty supper was soon prepared. We now thought of enjoying a quiet smoke at the river, but here our old enemy, the mosquito, awaited us, and with angry face we crawled into tent, which we had to close tightly to hinder the entrance of the troublesome insect. The air soon became hot and we tried in vain to sleep. A motion was made and discarded to go up to the farm house and sleep in the hay loft, and with resignation we laid down and with main force closed our eyes. We had not lain long when the near peals of thunder telegraphed a thunder storm. But now our courage grew and in confidence on our fortitude we determined to brave the elements. Soon the storm was upon us and with varied emotions we listened to the streaming rain and noticed the successive and never ceasing streaks of lightning. A high wind which had in the beginning swept over us soon disappeared and the lull in the storm gave us hopes for rest the remainder of the night. But to our dismay another shower reached us quite soon and this time made us wish that we had rather taken to the farmer's house.

The thunder was terrific, while all at once a gust of wind seized the tent and in spite of our endeavors to secure it twisted the same about. Just now the rain began to pour violently and to our intense dissatisfaction we felt the water running through our tent. Our quilts were wet, and soaked to the skin we at last determined to seek the shelter of the farm house. The captain with lantern in hand started ahead, the Jr. carried the pillows, while the grumbling steward made up the rear. We passed along a creek's steep banks and this time thanks to the lightning found our way. The woods soon took us up and with satisfaction we saw the near farm-yard, which we entered. The farmer was aroused easily and taking pity with our state showed us into the granary, where oats in plenty might form a soft cushion for our tormented bodies. We rid ourselves of the thoroughly wet clothes and spreading a buffalo robe drawing a sack over our feet we laid down to a half-way satisfying rest. In the morning we dressed hurriedly, ate some bread, and hurried on with the boats. We were at this moment totally dissatisfied with our luck, but one of the party in a humor of consolation told us we were not quite as badly off as the Arctic explorers. This somewhat quieted us and we kept on. Our poor steward felt badly for his good luck, and whenever his boat struck a rock, he jumped up, grasped his hair and in eloquent tones wished the Cottonwood river, its beauty and everything that induced him to make such a trip, to a place not far from the "Golden Gates." In sight of such an outgiving of human passion our tried and dried souls awoke and we tried our best to console him. In this way we kept on with a steady pull, and crossing the old dam at Frank's former mill, we found quiet water. Our spirits revived and coming around a bend of the river we noticed a tent in the distance and with shouts of joy announced our approach. Our voices must have sounded like the tones of the last trumpet, for no sooner had we uttered our shouts of satisfaction, when a couple of half-starved, knocked-out—gentlemen jumped up and bid us welcome.

It is sincerely hoped that the people will decorate their houses with bunting and evergreens next Saturday.

Peter Rötter, of Minneapolis, was shaking hands with his New Ulm friends last Saturday. He thinks the chickens found on the prairies in Brown and Nicollet counties are just a little better than any other.

If the dealers at New Ulm are to be believed, about all the farm machinery sold in southern Minnesota is obtained in that place. It is a good thing for the New Ulm dealers to have exalted opinions of themselves.—St. Peter Journal.

The New Ulm dealers in farm machinery do not lay claim to heavy sales for the purpose of brag and bluster, they have no time for doing that.

John Wich of Helena, Montana territory, a former New Ulm boy, sends us a bottle made from quartz representing every mine in Montana. The bottle is a gem, and in its manufacture are used many very rich specimens of gold and silver ores. Mr. Wich procured the collection at considerable trouble and expense, and the bottle was made under his own supervision. Mr. Wich has our heartfelt thanks for the valuable gift.

On Saturday, August 22, the re-union of the defenders of New Ulm in 1862 occurs in that place, and we apprehend their reception will be worthy of the occasion. The people of New Ulm are noted for their hospitality; but in this instance they will doubly welcome the heroes who defended their town and saved the lives of innocent men, women and children from the ruthless hands of savages. All who took part in that campaign should meet at New Ulm on the 22d. The citizens of New Ulm ask it.—St. Peter Journal.

Next Saturday promises to be an event worthy of record in Minnesota history, it being no less than a re-union of the living heroes who defended New Ulm in 1862. It is proper that such a re-union should be held in the place whose people were saved from the tomahawk and scalping-knife by the daring deeds of men who knew no fear and rushed to their rescue in the hour of danger. It is to be hoped that all who took part in that memorable defense will assemble at New Ulm next Saturday and participate in that fete.—St. Peter Journal.

The best medical authorities acknowledge the great value of Ayer's Cathartic Pills, and frequently prescribe their use with the utmost confidence, well knowing that they are the most effectual remedy ever devised for diseases caused by derangements of the stomach, liver and bowels.

The barb-wire manufacturers are getting things in condition to please them. They are holding meetings and it is said prices will soon go up again 15 per cent.

"Thick as leaves in Vallambrosa." This phrase was no doubt first applied to the testimonials of Mishler's Herb Bitters, for they really seem countless. F. Hoffman, of Circleville, Ohio, sends along his contribution: "This is to certify that I have had the dumb ague, and by using one bottle of Mishler's Herb Bitters a complete cure has been effected."

The Austrian government has at last officially notified this government that it will not receive Mr. Keilly as American minister, though it does not deign to give any reason for the decision.

It never fails to effect a speedy cure. My friends to whom I have recommended it speak of it in the same high terms.
