There are special reformatory prisons; but in fact, every penitentiary should be a reformatory prison. Special reformatories are needed for the younger convicts, who can be more easily moulded and transformed by preparation and discipline best suited to enable them to earn an honest living when they are released. But when such classification does not exist, the same intellectual, moral and industrial training must be wrought. Systematic habits and definite purpose may be acquired in a penitentiary under proper management, as well as in a reformatory proper. But rare ability and tact are necessary to bring about good results.

The best system is the graded one. The hardest, most exacting work must be given to the new comers. When they acquire patience, steadiness, fidelity in that, promote them to a grade above, where the work is lighter, and where incentives to reformatory effort are given in the shape of defined privileges, to be acquired by the most worthy. Thus there could be several grades, each one more luminous with hope, and stimulus to faithful performance of duty. These incentives may be adjusted to the taste and ambition of the convict. The system is in vogue in France and Belgium, and it has been tried with success in California and perhaps in other states.

Then, provision ought to be made, as is done in Massachusetts for the convict who has served his term. Under the generally prevalent system the ex-convict finds, when turned loose in the world, that all doors are slammed in his face and it looks as if society really means to force him back into a life of crime. It is evident that the state can, in large measure, shield the ex-convict from this terrible danger. A commission should look after the placing of all ex-convicts, who have given evidence of sincere reform, in positions where they can earn a living. By proper management, employers could be found who would take these men into service on probation. There is no doubt that in a large majority of cases the reformation would be found to be permanent. The question of the future of the released convict is one which ought to engage the most intelligent attention of penologists.—J. S. McLain in Minneapolis Journal.
