CHAPTER III—CONTINUED.

THROUGH LIFE OR DEATH.

"Young chaps are rash and liable to get into trouble. If there's goin' to be a scrimmage it wouldn't be a bad plan to have Simon Kenyon on hand."

Unfortunately, Simon did not know where Paul Markham had gone, and was his rather a blind search.

Paul in the meanwhile had gone straight to the Mormon's house where Ola was a prisoner. All his soul seemed aflame with indignation at the thought of her captivity. She a prisoner, held by a blindly fanatic uncle.

"I will rescue her or die in the effort," he said, hastening to the house.

Had Paul been less intent on rescuing Ola Hyde, and looked more after his own safety, he might have observed three or four dark forms slinking along behind him. Already the destroying Angels had started on their infamous business, and with unerring certainty would track their victim to some lonely out of the way spot, where a rifle shot would put him out of the way of their employer for ever.

Paul was allowed to reach the house unmolested, and unaware of the fact that his movements were being watched.

"The house is very quiet," he said, gazing up at the door and windows. "How am I to secure an entrance. Ola, Ola, in which dark prison room will I find you?"

He gazed at the windows of the house for some time, and then entirely round the block. The house was surrounded by a thick, low hedge, and at the rear he found a gap. Through this gap he forced his way, and found himself in a garden at the rear of the house.

All was still, and after a few moments listening, he stole softly forward to the house.

He paused under the rear windows and looked at each. From one window in the second story faint rays of light were emitted.

"That looks enough like a prison to be the one in which she is," thought Paul. "Now for some means to reach it."

He remembered having seen a long pole in the garden, and went back after it. The branches had been cut long, leaving excellent footholds for one to climb to the top.

Carrying the pole to the house, he placed it against the wall and climbed to the window.

"Here are iron bars," said Paul to himself, putting out his hand and touching them. "This must be her prison, how am I to get into it?"

At this moment he heard a low sigh followed by a sob from within. Pressing his face close to the bars, through a rent in the curtain, he saw a pale, beautiful girl sitting on the sofa.

"It is she, it is Ola," he whispered, softly, to himself, while his heart beat madly with delight. "Now, how am I to apprise her of my presence?"

No sooner had the thought suggested itself to his mind than a way was devised. Thrusting his hand through the bars he tapped the glass with his finger tips.

Ola started from her seat and went to the window, her heart beating with mingled hope and fear.

"It is I," he whispered. "Ola, Ola, are you a prisoner?"

"Yes," she answered, for, to her joy, she recognized at once her rescuer of the evening before.

"Will you go from here with me?" he asked in an undertone.

"I cannot get out, the door is locked," she answered.

"bars," whispered Paul, through his teeth, and drawing his stout-bladed bowie knife he began digging into the wall, which was of soft brick and yielded to his knife. Soon he had one end of a bar loosened and by superhuman effort, he tore it out of its socket and threw it upon the ground. Then he went at another, plunging his knife into the wall, and digging out the soft brick as his life depended upon his speed.

Soon another bar was loosened, then another, and a fourth, until he had an opening large enough for him to enter.

"Can you raise the window?" he whispered.

"Lift it gently, yet quickly, and get ready to go with me. I will carry you down this ladder."

She raised the window and Paul sprang lightly and noiselessly into the room. All his actions had been attended with very little noise. The Danites who were following him, had lost him for the time being, and the noise he had been compelled to make was too slight to attract their attention.

They found the gap by accident, and silently followed the path to the house which they reached a few moments after Paul had sprung through the window into the room.

"Are you ready?" Paul asked.

"In a moment," she answered, seizing a few articles and making them into a bundle and beginning to secure her wraps.

"I know all Ola," said Paul in a low tone which trembled with intensity. "I overheard Elder Drew—it is an infamous plot. Will you follow me wherever I take you?"

"I will," the beautiful girl answered, raising her sweet, patient face to Paul's.

"Oh, Ola, Ola, heaven only knows how much joy your faith gives me, but I love you, love you as I never loved, and never can love another, and in me you have a protector in whose care you will be as safe as if you were with your own father."

"Oh Paul, Paul!" cried Ola, and overcome by the emotions of her own heart, she sprang into his arms, and burying her face on his manly shoulders, shed tears of joy.

"Come, darling, we have no time to lose," he said, raising his fervent kisses upon her fair, sweet face. "We will away from this house, and this accursed town and then the first Christiana people we come among, we will be married. Come darling, a bright future is before us."

She smiled. What a world of love and happiness was in that smile. A saucy golden curl, escaping its confines, fell upon one lovely cheek, and kissing both curl and cheek, Paul replaced it.

"My love are you ready now?"

"I am," she answered.

Paul stepped to the window and once more raising it, climbed out upon the foot holds. At this moment the pole was so suddenly jerked from under him that he came near falling to the ground; but catching at the window sill, he sprang once more into the room.

"Burglar, a burglar in the house," cried a hoarse voice below and glancing in that direction, he saw three or four dark men.

A glittering pistol barrel was leveled at him, and just as he jerked his head out of the way, a bullet struck the top of the window sill.

"Oh, what shall we do?" cried Ola.

"Will you follow me?" he asked.

"Through life or death."

"Then come on."

Seizing a heavy chair, he broke down the door, and with his left arm about Ola's waist, and his revolver in his right hand, he leaped out into the dark hall, where they paused for a moment to listen.
