A little son, eight years old, perished in the flame and a thirteen-year-old daughter was severely burned while trying to rescue her little brother. The father was at Stahl, where he works in the mines, and the mother and eldest son were at the residence of F. S. Hoag, watching with the sick, leaving only the four younger children at home, three girls aged 13, 11 and 5 years, and the boy aged 8 years. The oldest girl was aroused by her youngest sister crying for a drink of water, and when she arose to get it for her discovered that the house was on fire. The second girl carried her little sister out of the burning building, while the other went to the foot of the stairs and aroused her brother, who answered to her call but did not come down. She ran out of the building and called again, when he came to the window and threw out his clothing, but refused to jump. In an effort to get back into the house she was terribly burned about the face, and failed to rescue him. His charred remains were found in the ruins next day. The origin of the fire is a mystery.
