AMONG THE FARMERS

Association, is an exhibitor of corn. He took the first prize last year on yellow corn on a ten-acre lot. He also won the sixth prize on white corn. His son, Henry, took the second prize in the young men's classes, and George the fourth prize.

H. H. Watson of O'Fallon, St. Charles county, said that the needs of that county were better barns and better farm buildings. His brother, R. K. Watson, said that the grounds in St. Charles county should be made more fertile, especially in the western section of it.

"I never saw such corn before," said C. J. Johnson, who lives near Pilot Grove, Mo., this morning. "I thought I had seen some good corn, but this beats all I ever saw. I am going to get some seed corn to take home with me, and next year I am going to enter the contests."

R. L. Creed, who owns 200 acres of land, said: "I came up to the convention to learn more for the farm and for my stock." Mr. Creed lives within twenty miles of Columbia. He was here twenty-nine years ago and made his first visit since then to Columbia yesterday.

An organization meeting of the State Association of County Fairs was held at 10 o'clock this morning in the auditorium of the Agricultural Building. The purpose of the association was set forth, and plans for better organization were discussed. The chief idea brought out was the advantage to each individual fair if a strong association of county fairs was organized.

J. E. Thompson, vice-president of the Corn Growers' Association, said that the crowd here today was the largest and best he has ever seen at any of these meetings. "I think that every county that is represented here this week should organize a club," said Mr. Thompson. "Bates county has organized and at a meeting last night there were twenty-five or twenty-six present. The club is composed of students in the University from Bates county and of farmers who are here this week."

Mr. Thompson owns the Clover Blossom Stock Farm near Butler and handles pure bred horses and fine blooded live stock of all kind.

About thirty-five women attended the reception given yesterday afternoon by the home economics department in the Geology Building. The reception was for women who are in Columbia for the Missouri Home-Makers Conference.

Refreshments were served, consisting of tea, chocolate, sandwiches, cakes and mints, all of which had been prepared by the girls in the department.

"Your refreshments are delicious," said one of the visitors.

"Well, they ought to be; we worked all morning on them," answered one of the girls.

The girls who are taking home economics served and also acted as guides, taking the visitors through the various rooms of the department, explaining the work done in each.

J. F. Fortner, a fruit-grower of Willard, Mo., is here to get all the information he can on fruit raising.

"I have a forty-acre apple orchard," said Mr. Fortner this morning, "and I came here to find out how to keep the late frost from killing my fruit. The trees that we grow in our part of the country are just as good as are raised in this section, but for some reason we do not have as good a success with the fruit. The farmers used to believe that it was not necessary to take care of their fruit trees but would set them out and that was all they would do to them, until they were large enough to bear fruit. In later years they have found out that fruit trees should be watched and cultivated the same as any other product."

FARMER WITH BANK ACCOUNT

That is the kind the Agricultural Management Department is Trying to Make.

"The farmer who at the close of the year has a surplus bank account is the successful one, and this is the kind that the Farm Management Department is trying to make." With this statement Prof. D. H. Doane of the College of Agriculture closed his address to the farmers in the auditorium of the Agricultural Building yesterday afternoon. His subject was, "What Farm Management has Meant to Missouri Farmers." His lecture was a brief summary of the work he has done in the six years that he has been connected with the Farm Management Department.

Professor Doane said: "Nearly six years ago I began this work, but you never heard what was being done until last year. Up to a year ago I spent my time in field work visiting numerous farms throughout the United States, gathering data and getting the basic principles upon which to work direct from the farmers themselves.

"We put no money directly into the farmers' hands for the management of their farms, but spend our money visiting them and working out a plan of management for them. The Missouri Farm Management Association is a body of farmers whom we know are reliable and interested in their work, and it is through these men that we are able to carry on much of the work in farm management.

"We go to your farms, look them over, plan to improve their fertility and still let them remain profitable. We have demonstration farms in several counties in the state where we carry out our co-operative plans. The best co-operative farmers are made demonstration farmers. On the demonstration farms we hold meeting each year and show the results obtained. Such a meeting was held last summer on the farm of R. S. Harriman in Cooper county."

W. L. Nelson, assistant secretary of the State Board of Agriculture, followed Mr. Doane with a lecture on "Farming from the Farmer's Viewpoint."

J. J. Vrooman, the manager of an 8,000 acre farm in Adair, Putnam and Sullivan counties, played a violin solo, accompanied by Mrs. Vrooman at the piano. Mr. Vrooman is a student in the short course in agriculture, Miss Doane, a sister of Professor Doane, sang a solo, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Vrooman with violin and piano.

ASKS LARGER FARM SCHOOL

Committee of College of Agriculture Recommends Better Laboratories In Report to State Board.

More extensive laboratories with better equipment and more room for the increasing number of students, was the recommendation by the committee of the College of Agriculture, at the annual meeting of the Missouri State Board of Agriculture yesterday. A committee is appointed each year by the Board of Agriculture to inspect the college. This year, the committee was composed of W. R. Wilkinson, G. H. Sly and P. P. Lewis. The committee was strong in its commendation of the work of the students and officers of the College of Agriculture. The college now has an enrollment of 652, which is 25 per cent more than that of last year. This large enrollment has made it impossible for some departments to accommodate all the students who would take the course. This is especially true in the live stock and dairy husbandry departments. Many had to be turned away from these courses this year.

In the committee's report praise was given to the various judging teams and to the College for producing a world's champion cow. Last year 460 public addresses were made by students and officers of the College of Agriculture to a total of more than 300,000 persons. On one trip of eleven days five professors of the College lectured to 28,000 people from special trains on the Frisco, Burlington and Santa Fe railroads. The College also established two night schools, one in Kansas City and the other in St. Louis, last year. Forty-two county fairs were judged by students in the College. Three thousand men and boys throughout the state were enrolled in the corn growing contest. One of the most important works done by the College of Agriculture was the annihilation of 40,000 hogs infected with cholera. More than 80 per cent of this number were cured.

The committee also recommended the establishment of a department of forestry in the College of Agriculture.

W. C. Hutchison of Jamesport, Mo., was elected president of the Board of Agriculture late yesterday afternoon. Other officers elected by the board were: Vice-president, P. P. Lewis of Crescent, Mo.; secretary, T. C. Wilson, Columbia; assistant secretary, W. R. Nelson, Columbia; treasurer, W. L. Bright, Columbia.

The Missouri State Board of Agriculture is composed of sixteen practical farmers, one from each congressional district in the state, and three ex-officio members. The only new member appointed was Frederick T. Munson, who succeeded John Deewester.
