live down to the faults you may find in them.

"Tell all the good things you can. Suggest good to every boy and girl, especially. Presently they will believe that they are all good, and they will work to be better. And before you realize it they will be better.

"Men, you could keep your wives always if you would treat them like you had to before you were married. Love your wife, be kind to her, keep her life cheerful, for she is all the world to you. With that kind of treatment, she will never make you gloomy," said Mr. Adams.

In closing, the speaker told the story of Valentine Burke, a notorious crook who read some good thoughts on a scrap of paper he found in jail. He resolved to be good and useful. He tried for several years. Finally in despair, he returned from the east to St. Louis, resolved to be a crook again, as it was the only life left for him, he thought.

Thought Changes Appearance.

But when he got off the train at St. Louis, the sheriff put out his hand and said: "Hello, Burke, I'm mighty glad to see you. I want you to be my deputy sheriff. Detectives have watched you ever since you left here, and you're the man I want."

Burke assisted the sheriff, but his face was a map of his former vices and citizens mistrusted him. He prayed to be made good looking. A few years later the wholesome thoughts which then dominated his life took expression in a hearty, wholesome face. Happy, healthy thoughts had made another man of Valentine Burke.

"The curative powers of happiness, of course, have limitations," Mr. Adams concluded, "but we know that we can be more useful and healthier if we practice being cheerful."

Throughout the address, the audience applauded generously. The wide-awake delivery of the speech, and the subject matter, reached the hearts of the crowd.

GEORGIA LYNCHERS
HANG HIM TO TREE

the sheriff. Frank's wife swooned at the prison and went into convulsions at the news of his death after hours of suspense. She left at noon for Athens, Ga., to visit relatives.

Frank's body was not finally cut down until after speeches had been made by a number of persons in the crowd. One address was by a Marietta man, who urged that the body be mutilated. Judge Morris spoke in opposition to this, urging that order be maintained. After the entire crowd had voted against mutilation, the body was lowered from the tree and lifted in a basket into a wagon which started for Marietta, where, it was announced, an inquest would begin at noon.

During this process, mutterings in favor of mutilation again began in the crowd. So Judge Morris ran his automobile alongside the wagon and lifted the corpse into his car and sped towards Atlanta. Two hundred automobiles gave chase. There were several thousand persons in the crowd about the tree when the body was cut down. Despite the pleadings of Judge Morris several men in the throng leaped forward as the body was laid on the ground and stamped on Frank's face with their heels.

An Advertising Idea for Bankers

It would be well for bankers to unite by communities in order effectively to take the lead in a thrift campaign. Let co-operation prevail among the banking institutions of each community, and local campaigns of information and education be carried on by the banks acting jointly, with the object of fostering thrift and accumulating capital for legitimate business purposes.

Bankers owe it to their towns and cities, to the legitimate business of this country and to the commerce of the world to encourage the people to invest their money in legitimate enterprises, and to keep it away from fraudulent schemers. Bankers owe it to themselves, as well as to the business world, to encourage a wider exercise of thrift on the part of Americans than they have been accustomed to in the past.

Banks Should Protect Public.

It seems to me to be a duty of bankers to protect the public, by publicity of the right sort, against the insidious appeals of unscrupulous promoters of brass edged securities, to try to divert into legitimate channels of trade hundreds of millions of dollars which annually flow into the treasure chests of the pirates of finance, who prey on widows and orphans, and sometimes on those who ought to know better than be caught by offers of 70 per cent dividends.

It is my firm conviction that a thorough, intelligent and prolonged campaign of publicity in almost any community, carried on by the banks acting jointly, would result in increased business for all the banks; that is, increased deposits which would be converted into working capital for carrying on business and increasing the prosperity of the business community.

A campaign of community advertising by the banks should aim to accomplish the following results:

What Campaign Would Do.

1. To educate the people to a higher standard of thrift and thus actually increase the working capital of the community. America has a long way to go before it can approach the record of France, for instance, for widespread thrift and consequent wide-spread ability to invest in high class securities.
2. To educate the public to the economic usefulness of banking institutions. Too many people look upon a bank as "merely a place to put your money," losing sight entirely of the important part which the bank plays in maintaining the prosperity of the business world.
3. To increase the stream of small contributions of capital into channels of legitimate business, and diminish the stream which flows into the illegitimate channels where the money is finally lost in the "slough of despond."

The public ought to be taught that the banks of deposit are like reservoirs which collect capital from many small sources for use when and where most needed for carrying on the business life of the community.—By Edwin B. Wilson in the New York Times.
