SAYS COUNTY'S WHEAT IS OK

W. T. Anderson Examines Plants, and Finds Roots Still Alive.

Boone County wheat is in first-class condition, according to W. T. Anderson, president of the Boone County Milling Company. The farmers of the county had begun to think that next year's crop of wheat would not be worth harvesting, but Mr. Anderson says that up to the present the wheat has not been hurt.

Mr. Anderson made a close study of fields yesterday, examining the plants on both bottom land and hill land and being careful to investigate slopes which face all directions. He reports that, although the tops are completely killed in most places, the roots are alive and in fine shape. Lack of snow has not hurt the wheat up until now, he says; the roots seem to have plenty of moisture. He admits that a snow would be a help, but says that it was not absolutely necessary just now.

The country around Columbia comprises one of the best wheat districts in the state, according to Mr. Anderson. Last year was the first for a long time that wheat in large quantities has not been shipped out of the district. On account of the poor crop, he says, not a bushel has left the county. Only winter wheat is raised here, he adds, and this forms a big portion of the agricultural product of the county.

The consensus of opinion among the twenty or twenty-five farmers interviewed by a Missourian reporter yesterday was that the wheat had been injured by the wind and dry weather, although the injury is not so great as was first thought. All the tops were dead, but the roots were still green. Some went so far as to say the crop had practically suffered no injury, while some said it had been hurt considerably. One man said he had offered to sell his crop for the seed he had sown. Most of them said that although it is not possible to tell just yet what the yield will be, the injury suffered so far will not have an appreciable effect.
