VOCATIONAL STUDENTS IN AGRICULTURE MEET

Veterans' Bureau Explains Project Training—Talks Given by Former Students.

About 150 men attended an informal meeting called by the Veterans' Bureau last night for the purpose of explaining project training to the vocational students in agriculture who are eligible for it.

W. W. Lewelling, supervisor of agricultural training in the Ninth District, made a short talk on the relation of the Veterans' Bureau to the trainee on project training. He discussed the reasons why the present plan of project training is in operation, and the length of time that a student might expect aid from the government after he leaves school on a project.

F. B. Mumford, dean of the College of Agriculture, made the next talk and told of the relation of the University to project training. He told why a foundation of university training is necessary to a man before he goes out and tries to farm without having gained the experience elsewhere.

Following Dean Mumford's talk, P. H. Ross told the men how they could best co-operate with their county agent, Dan Stecklaub, a vocational student in the University, told what he expected his training to do for him.

Otto Ernst, a former student in the College of Agriculture, who is now out on project training, told what his project training was meaning to him. Ernst is now successfully operating a farm of his own.

George F. Reeves, assistant supervisor of agricultural training in the Ninth District, made the final talk of the evening. He told about some of the men who are out on their own farms, and what the Veterans' Bureau expected of the men after they had finished their institutional training.

M. R. Murray, local co-ordinator for the Veterans' Bureau acted as chairman of the meeting.
