Unless somebody stops him, a man down in Humansville, Polk County, Mo., is going to pour 1,000 gallons of wine into a ditch. He says he wants the barrels for cider. This information has been sent to Columbia by Arthur Jeffrey of Humansville, in a letter to T. C. Wilson, secretary of the State Board of Agriculture. Jeffrey says the man with the wine is "a neighbor of his." The wine was made several years ago and the county since has been voted "dry." Jeffrey appealed to Secretary Wilson to find some other way to dispose of the wine.

There will be regular class room drills in pronunciation, articulation and the control of the voice.

Rich Hill is burning natural gas again, says the Review. The natural product was turned on Saturday night, and under only partial pressure the gas holder soared upward immediately. The holder was then weighted down and the pressure in the mains has been all that could be desired. If the pressure continues at the present rate, there will be no cause for complaint. The gas is fine, and with the present volume and pressure maintained heats the artificial gas all hollow, both for cooking and lighting.
