SYNOPSIS.

The chief characters are Ethel Wilton, Henry Streetman and Capt. Larry Redmond. The minor characters are Sir George Wagstaff of the British admiralty and Charles Brown, a New York newspaper correspondent. Ethel is a resident of Sir George's household, secretly married to Streetman, a German spy, though she did not know him as such. Captain Redmond, her old lover, returns to England after long absence. From him she learns the truth about Streetman, furthermore, that he has betrayed her simply to learn naval secrets. The European war breaks out.

Betrayed by a German spy, and feeling that her life had been wrecked by his perfidy, Ethel prepares to wreak a vengeance that will help to take away some of the rancor in her heart and at the same time be of service to her country. Truly there is no wrath like a wronged woman's. An exciting scene between the girl and her false husband is pictured in this installment.

Streetman, the German spy, calls on Ethel just after she has learned of his deceit.

CHAPTER X.—Continued.

Streetman waited until the butler had withdrawn before he so much as spoke to her. Then he faced her expectantly.

"Did you see Sir George?" he demanded—almost threateningly. It seemed to Ethel.

"Yes," she replied quietly, though her every nerve was strung taut to meet the call upon her woman's strategy.

"The fleet—did you find out about the fleet?" He could not get the words out of his mouth fast enough.

"Yes! After what you said, what else could I do?"

"Quite so!" He made no attempt to conceal his insolence. "Has it sailed?" he asked her impudently.

"Yes."

"Where did it go? Quick, tell me!" By word and look both he menaced her.

"The usual routine," she said nonchalantly. "It just split up into its various squadrons—the Mediterranean, Baltic, Black sea, South American fleets, and so on; and they've gone to their customary destinations."

"Sir George told you that?" The news was almost too good to be believed.

"Yes, and he never suspected I was the least bit interested."

"The old fool!" He told himself that Sir George was no better than a dotard. With such as he composing the English admiralty the spy was sure that Germany had nothing to fear from the British lion. That much-vaunted animal's teeth seemed effectually drawn.

"What news with you?" Ethel asked him, innocently enough, so far as Streetman noticed.

"I have had none direct from France," he said, never dreaming that the time was past when he might deceive her by that little fiction of his. "But war has come," he added, "so that I am sure."

"And England—will she enter into it?" she pressed him.

"With her fleet dispersed she will not dare," he rejoined with a faint smile of satisfaction.

"For the sake of France, your country, that is a pity," Ethel pointed out. With her former doubts reinforced by the revelation of Larry's tale she could easily pick flaws, now, in Streetman's acting.

"Oh, yes, of course—yes!" he hastened to assent. "I must get the news at once to France," he said, and immediately he started toward the doorway. But the girl said something then that brought him up sharply—something that he was far from expecting, at that moment when he seemed at last to hold her more securely than ever before.

"To Germany, you mean?" she corrected him. Quiet as was her tone, the words seemed to him fairly to stab the air.

"What?" he exclaimed.

"Oh, Henry, how can you think me so very stupid?"

"You are mad!" he parried. "I am loyal to France."

"You tell me that," she scoffed, "when here, a little while ago, in all your talk you showed how strongly you sided with Prussia. Just now you were delighted that the English fleet had dispersed. To a Frenchman that would be bad news; but a German would take it as you have done. You are in the service of the Wilhelmstrasse—a true Teuton, and I've been quite blind not to realize it before."

Streetman looked positively dangerous as he was faced by her threateningly. At last he was at bay. But still he had no thought of confessing the part that he was playing.

"And to what use do you intend putting your absurd accusations?" he demanded.

"None—none at all," she said carelessly, with just a slight shrug of her fine shoulders. "I merely wanted you to know that I know."

"Oh, is that all? I thought you were trying to threaten me," he answered, more than puzzled by her attitude.

"My dear, why should I do that? You still love me; and now that I've learned about the fleet, you still mean next week to arrange matters with your people to announce our marriage."

"Of course, of course!" he broke in upon her hurriedly. "He had forgotten, for the moment, all about that plausible promise of his. As matters stood on the continent he had thought it more than likely that another week would find him out of England for good. But now he congratulated himself that he had made her that promise. So far as he could see, that false hope he had held out to her was all that stood between him and the Tower of London—and likely worse. "Certainly we'll announce our marriage," he assured her. "All that I told you of my family, my income, was true—except that I'm German, not French."

"She gave him an amused look.

"But you see, you are not as clever as you thought," she informed him. "If you'd only been frank with me, I could have been of so much greater help to you."

"You could?" he said, as a look of mystification spread over his face. "How? Why?"

"I have not been quite honest with you," Ethel said.

He seized her roughly by the arm.

"You have not lied to me about the fleet?" he threatened.

"No, no! That was absolutely true," Streetman reassured her then.

"Then what do you mean?" he asked. So long as she had not deceived him in that quarter it mattered little to him what she might have done.

"I told you," Ethel explained. "I told you there was no Englishman in my life. I lied. There was—a captain in the English army. Before I met you we were engaged. He threw me over for some other woman—a woman with money. . . . I hate him!" Streetman saw no reason to doubt her. As Ethel flung herself into the character of a woman scorned she did her best to convince him of the truth of the old adage that hell had no fury such as hers. As she perceived the stress of her ruse she hurried on to elaborate her fiction. "Yes, I hate him!" she repeated. "I hate their army! I hate all Englishmen. It is for you—for Germany I would serve," she told him. "That is why I have not done more for you. I thought you were working for France, England's ally. England—how I hate her! I want to see her dishonored, defeated, ruined by your people."

"You—you?" Streetman cried, as a great light broke over him. "And I never dreamed!" he murmured, as he seized both her hands. He was not rough now—but eager, impulsive. "Yes, it is true," he said then. "I am a German. I serve the Wilhelmstrasse."

"Then let me serve it, too!" Ethel begged, much as she had besought Larry Redmond only a short quarter of an hour before. But then she had been in earnest. "Think what a woman—could do, and a clever woman," she urged. "Take me with you, wherever you go. I would be useful!"

The idea pleased Streetman.

"Yes, you would!" he exclaimed. "And you shall go. You shall go with me tonight."

"Where?" she asked him.

"To Brussels!"

"Brussels—but why there?"

He told her then the very heart of the German plan.

"Germany will invade France through Belgium," he informed her. "In two weeks we shall be in Paris."

"But Germany's treaty with Belgium—you forget that?" Ethel reminded him. She could not believe that any country that retained the meager vestige of honor would so delude herself. "Belgium's territory must be sacred," she said.

He released her hands then. He needed even them to express his scorn.

"Treaty? Bah! What is that—a scrap of paper!" he cried.

"But are you sure?" she pressed him. This, she knew, was information—and big information, of the greatest moment to the English war office.

"Yes, yes! I'm sure!" he declared. "That is the plan worked out by the great general staff, and we must go to Belgium tonight. You will meet me in an hour at Charing Cross. Tomorrow we shall be in Brussels."

"Where shall we stay in Brussels?"

"I am sent to the Grand hotel," he explained. "I shall pass myself off as Monsieur de Lorde. You shall be Madame de Lorde."

"Madame de Lorde!" she repeated, as if to fix the name indelibly upon her memory.

"In Brussels we shall await instructions," he continued. "When they come we shall do much—you and I—for the Vaterland. . . . Good-by, my dear, until tonight!" He started to go. But he turned back suddenly as if the urge of great events had not quite effaced all thought of his relations with Ethel. He leaned toward her. "Now," he said, "now you won't refuse to kiss me?"

She could scarcely do otherwise than submit to his now. He put his arms around her, and when he had taken his kiss he said, "In an hour!" Then he hurried away.

Ashamed, disgusted, Ethel wiped her lips with loathing. And in another moment she had thrown open the door behind which Captain Redmond waited.

"Larry—Larry!" she called.

"What is it?" he cried, springing quickly to her side. Her tragic manner alarmed him.

She turned away from him; for she could not bear to face his honest eyes as she told him what she felt she must. "I hoped I'd never have to tell you this," she said, "but now that it has come, I've got to. Larry, the man I married is a German spy!"

"A German spy? Your husband?"

"But it can't be!" he exclaimed incredulously.

"But it is!" she insisted. "I only just found out. Till now I thought he loved me—a little. But he didn't. He's cheated, tricked me for the things I could tell him about the navy. That's why he married me, because he was a spy. . . . But now I've fooled him!" she exclaimed fiercely. "I've made him believe that I, too, am with the Germans and that I shall work with him."

The situation staggered Captain Redmond. He seemed nonplussed.

"But what can I do? I can't arrest him—your husband," he told her.

"No—you can't, for tonight he goes to Brussels and I go with him. I shall be at the Grand hotel, as Madame de Lorde."

"You are going to Brussels?" he repeated, grasping, even as he spoke, something of the import of the news.

"Yes, for Germany is to invade France through Belgium!"

"Good heavens!" he gasped, astounded at the enormity. "But you can't go there—with him! I forbid it!"

"No, no!" she protested. "You promised we'd work together—that you wouldn't try to stop me. You promised on your honor."

"But my dear, you can't hold me to that now!" he objected.

"But I do!" she insisted. "I'm going to Brussels. Even you can't prevent it. . . . Good-by, Larry!" And she started to leave him.

He stopped her quickly.

"Ethel! Please!" he entreated. "No, Larry!" was the firm answer.

He saw that her determination was too great to be denied. And he walked up to her then and raised his hand to hold her for just a fleeting moment longer.

"In Two Weeks We Shall Be in Paris."

"Wait!" he besought her. "I'll come to you tomorrow in Brussels. Perhaps somehow I can help you—protect you."

"Oh, you can, Larry, you can!" she panted, all but overcome by relief and gratitude. She had quailed at the thought of her perilous mission. But nevertheless she had never hesitated to go through with it. "Remember—Grand hotel—Madame de Lorde! I'll learn everything for you tonight—for king and country!" And she held her hand out to him impulsively.

He caught it in both of his.

"For king and country!" he repeated after her bravely. And then he kissed her hand with something akin to reverence. "And for you!" Captain Redmond whispered.

CHAPTER XI.

At the Lion D'Or.

In the little Belgian village of Courvoisier two happy peasants were playing checkers in an inn called the Lion D'Or. It was still August—still the finest of summer weather. And in the carefree minds of those two idlers there was not the slightest reason for them to forego their customary afternoon diversion, even if their great and powerful neighbors—Germany and France—were at that very moment crouched and ready to spring at each other's throats. In Belgium all was peaceful. And the very sun seemed to shine upon that tiny country with just a little more beneficence than it had over the rest of the world. For Belgium, fortunately, there was no dread of war. Secure in the conviction that she had no enemies, her people went about their affairs with the same unbothered content that they had come to regard, through the years, as their natural heritage.

"Volla, messieurs!" the inn's sole waiter, Louis, exclaimed as he laid upon the table the change that was due the two guests. And "Behold, gentlemen!" he repeated in quite the grand manner as he placed before them two beer glasses filled with an amber ambrosia.

The players thanked him. And in that moment one of them brought the wine to a swift termination by the execution of a masterly move toward which he had long been maneuvering.

The two peasants tossed off their drinks then. They had already risen from their chairs when the innkeeper himself, one Henri Christophe, entered.

"You're going already?" he exclaimed, reluctant to see good customers leaving. "It is not late."

"My wife expects me," one of them replied with a humorous grimace. "You understand?"

"Mais oui! I comprehend perfectly," Christophe answered. He knew the couple's wife—a somewhat temperamental woman, with a sharp tongue. And he had no wish to bring down an avalanche of ill-will upon his excellent innkeeper. So he bade his departing guests good-by.

As they passed through the open doorway, chattering, he turned to another man who sat in a corner of the room reading a newspaper. He was a Frenchman—that other—and a stranger to the innkeeper.

"Something for monsieur?" Henri Christophe inquired pleasantly.

"Not now!" After a little while, perhaps, the stranger replied, and returned to his reading of his newspaper. He had just lighted a cigarette and had filled his lungs with the first satisfying puff when a newcomer strode through the doorway. This latest arrival wore a cap and a long, lined duster. And there was something in his aspect that did not wholly please the little man at the table, as he cast a quick, sidewise glance at the tall intruder. Perhaps it was the small, Teuton mustache that adorned the upper lip of the tall man in the dustercoat. At all events, the Frenchman's eyes narrowed to two slits. And though he seemed rap in his paper he nevertheless watched every move that the other made.

The tall man peeped for a moment at the cigar case that stood just inside the outer door, and drawing a pipe from his pocket he filled and lighted it. Then he crossed the room and looked down at its other occupant.

"Do you speak English?" he inquired.

The man told him that he could.

"Can you tell me how far it is to Tourville?" Larry Redmond asked. The tall man was no other than the Irish captain.

"Ten miles," the Frenchman replied promptly.

"Exactly?" Larry questioned.

There was a slight yet still noticeable pause as the little man looked up at him searchingly.

"Exactly!" he said with a peculiar emphasis on the word.

"Exactly?" Larry said once more. And when the wiry Frenchman sprang up from his seat and looked significantly into his eyes Captain Redmond no longer doubted that they understood each other. "You have the password?" he whispered.

"Exactly!" the other repeated finally.

"You have been waiting long, my friend?" Larry asked him.

"You were expected yesterday," his confederate replied.

"I could not leave then. It is busy back there inside their lines." Captain Redmond explained.

His fellow spy started at that. And he looked at him with undisguised surprise.

"You have been with the German army?" he exclaimed, as if the feat were scarcely to be believed.

"No, not yet! But tonight I shall be in the German army. I must join my regiment at once." He pulled aside his duster, revealing the fact that he was already in the German uniform. The long linen coat effectually concealed his dress, for there was nothing about his leather puttees to betray it. "I shall be a captain—Captain Karl," Larry continued.

The Frenchman regarded him soberly.

"Here in that uniform, it is dangerous work, Captain Redmond," he reminded him.

Do you think it possible for Captain Redmond to associate intimately with the German officers and men and remain undiscovered?

LABOR CONDEMNS SALOON.

"The time has come in this country when even men who take an occasional drink and feel it their right and privilege to do so, if they please, are coming to agree that it is not right for a man to make it his business to cultivate the vices of a community, and to take from men money that belongs to their families, giving them in exchange liquid madness, brutality, insanity and damnation."

These words were spoken by Rev. William B. Millard in an address at a remarkable labor meeting held in Garrick theater, Chicago. "The labor union, like the church," continued Mr. Millard, "should regard the open saloon as its greatest enemy. The time has come, may be so near, that the rosy radiance of the glorious dawn already greets our eyes, when the saloon will be abolished and the barkeeper outlawed, so that a man may no longer be waylaid on payday and sent home to his broken-hearted wife and terrified little ones a raging, loathsome, penniless beast."

Tremendous applause greeted these sentiments. The theater was packed to utmost capacity with representatives of union labor.

RED ROSES INSTEAD.

The place formerly occupied by one of Spokane's most notorious saloons is now a "brilliantly lighted, clean-smelling" market where "crops, cabbages and groceries replace the foaming brew" once sold there in great abundance. At the same counter where "red roses" were formerly in line, a fair maiden now dispenses "red roses," and at the site of the former "big bar," young men are now busy dealing out fresh meats of all kinds. Nobody but the former brewer and saloonkeeper complains that "business is ruined under prohibition. "Spokane is feeling right smart pert under prohibition, thank you!"

CUTS CITY'S EXPENSES.

Mayor Anderson of The Dalles, Oregon, furnishes this bit of testimony: "Since the first of the year, when the prohibition law went into effect, all lines of business have improved. This changed condition is particularly noticeable in groceries and meat markets, both cash business and collections showing a marked gain. The following figures are taken from our official records and show the effect of prohibition on the police court:

Arrests for	Cost of Feeding
Drunkennes	City Prisoners
Jan. and Feb., 1915	$17.45
Jan. and Feb., 1916	$12.45
Jan. and Feb., 1914	$12.72
Jan. and Feb., 1915	$12.72
Jan. and Feb., 1916	$12.72
Jan. and Feb., 1916	$12.72

TESTIMONY FROM ILLINOIS.

According to the records of the police officials in Illinois dry cities have 75 per cent less crime to contend with than wet cities of the same size. Aurora, while under the saloon administration, had 1,965 arrests for drunkenness, while in dry Rockford, with the same population, there were only 719 arrests. Wet Joliet had 1,682 arrests for drunkenness while dry Decatur had 564. Both towns are of the same size. Still another instance was the 3,319 arrests in East St. Louis as against 454 in dry Galeburg. The reports show that the majority of these arrests was due to the introduction of liquor from the surrounding wet territory.

TEETOTALERS WIN.

In Germany a walking contest was conducted over a course of 62 miles. Eighty-one men entered the contest, of whom only 24 were abstainers, but the first four men who crossed the line were abstainers. Of the ten prize-winners, six were teetotalers and two had been abstaining for some time while in training. More than half of the non-abstainers fell out by the way, but only two of the 24 abstainers.

THEY WORK ANYWAY.

"It's the women," growled a portly saloonist. "They are behind all of this. They will find out. If they are going to run things, we are going to let them work." Whereupon his quick-witted listener remarked, "The wives of drinking men always have had to work. If they have to choose between a sober husband and work, or a drunk one man and work anyway, I think they will take the dry man."

LAW WELL ENFORCED.

Following various rumors that the prohibition law was being violated the chief of police of Centralia, Wash., offered $20 reward from his own purse for information leading to the conviction of a bootlegger. The chief declares there is not one in the city. To a man who said he could get whisky, the chief gave a dollar to buy a bottle. The dollar was later returned.

MEN BUYING MORE CLOTHES.

"Last year I hired a man to go out and work against state-wide prohibition. If it were to be voted upon again, I would employ a man to go out and work for it. My business has increased 25 per cent since January 1."

EFFECTS OF LIQUOR.

Said one wife, "When my husband drinks whisky, he soon gets stupid; but when he drinks beer, he runs after me with a knife!"

"Why, less than three hundred years ago the whole of Manhattan island had a value of twenty-four dollars. Parts of it are now valued at the rate of forty million dollars an acre."

"I can't see much change. I couldn't have bought it three hundred years ago or now."

High Pay.

A Buffalo man stopped a newsboy in New York, saying: "See here, son, I want to find the Black National bank. I'll give you half a dollar if you direct me to it." With a grin, the boy replied: "All right, come along, and he led the man to a building half a block away. The man paid the proffered fee, remarking, however: "That was half a dollar easily earned." "Sure!" responded the lad. "But you mustn't forget that bank directors is paid high in New York!"—Exchange.

"Rite" Rebuke

The prince of Wales has endeared himself to the British soldiers fighting in the trenches.

There is a story about a regiment that the prince recently reviewed. A soldier in this regiment was noted equally for his bravery and his untidiness. The prince talked to him for a few minutes, and the man in his confusion could stammer nothing but "Your rite 'lightness." "Yes, your rite 'lightness," "No, your rite 'lightness."

At the end of the interview the prince said, with a good-natured glance at the soldier's accoutrements disordered as usual: "Very good, my man very good; but in future, please, not so much of the rite 'lightness and a little more of the pipe rite."
