IRISH HOME RULE.

The law providing for Irish home rule is now an accomplished fact, the bill for that purpose having passed through all the necessary stages of parliamentary procedure, and having been signed by the king.

But French used up his horses in the Boer war at a rate which scared the upper house an absolute veto on all legislation. If the lords remain obdurate in their opposition to a bill which has the support of the ministry, which, of course, is always representative of the majority in the commons, the hands of the government were tied except that, as a last resort, the ministry could always pack the upper house by creating new peers of their own political persuasion.

The transformation of the home rule bill into a home law is one of the results of this highly important change. The event has attracted but slight attention and brought forth little comment.

PATRIOTIC ETIQUETTE.

The centennial of the writing of "The Star Spangled Banner" has brought forth a good deal of comment, editorial and individual, on this song in particular, and patriotic songs in general, and in many of the articles mention has been made of the singular lack of responsiveness on the part of American audiences to the singing and playing of the two compositions which, by custom and common consent, have long been regarded as our two great national songs.

It being rancid this morning all the fellow men across to Jack Stanton's that new fellow from the city, who has moved to the house where they have laid curtains. Steve Hardy's mother not having been invited to call there today Steve to find out if he could if they was long curtains or not, so when we got there Steve went in to the house & saw Jack's sister Maud, & sed, "please can I look at them."

mies and navies and military systems. But the existence of those things in Europe has accustomed the people there to at least the outward forms of respect for the national flag, the national song, and the things which are closely associated with the national spirit.

On the other hand, let us not turn the thing into a farce by jumping to our feet when the band strikes "Oh, how can you see," in the middle of a medley, to find, when the first four bars are over, we are paying a tribute of respect to a quick march or a piece of ragtime.

HORSES IN WAR.

Wall Street Journal: It is one of the grim realities of war that men are far cheaper than horses. They can be more easily replaced. They are not so costly to feed; nor does what they eat involve the bulk of transport necessary to sustain a large cavalry force.

When an advance is checked, much is said about the exhaustion of the men. Exhaustion of the horses is a far more serious matter, because the men can soon rest or be recruited, but the lost horses can only be replaced at a costly expenditure of time.

In the German staff record and study of the Boer war the highest praise of any general, after Lord Kitchener, was given to the present Field Marshal French. He has the rare talent of handling cavalry in mass. Cavalry generals are born rather than made; and the German staff paid him the compliment of likening him to Ney and Phil Sheridan.

But French used up his horses in the Boer war at a rate which scared the upper house an absolute veto on all legislation. If the lords remain obdurate in their opposition to a bill which has the support of the ministry, which, of course, is always representative of the majority in the commons, the hands of the government were tied except that, as a last resort, the ministry could always pack the upper house by creating new peers of their own political persuasion.

The world supply of horses is limited, and the effect of commandeering is likely to be felt in next year's plowing, to say nothing of the harvest. It is well enough to talk of the women and old men attending to the sowing and harvesting. But the horse is an imperative necessity in such agricultural work, and his absence will be severely felt.

The horse is indeed one of the sinews of war. Perhaps another, equally important though different, is gasoline. The exhaustion of these two essentials may be a matter of life and death to Germany at no distant date.

TRADE OPPORTUNITIES.

There is much that merits American attention in the statement of the Russian premier a few days ago with reference to the trade possibilities in his own country which will be opened up as a result of the war. He calls attention to the enormous extent and undeveloped condition of Russia, to the tremendous demand that there will be there for many years for goods from foreign lands, and to the fact that there will be a strong desire
