

WHAT THEY ARE DOING IN SOCIETY

The Coming Day. The Night is ended and the Morning nears; Awake, look up! I hear an ocean roar...

And they that dwell apart shall know each other; And they that hymn their solemn songs alone...

And countless tongues upon a note of praise; Shall hang, until, like thunder in the hills...

That note shall soar from every living heart; That endless note shall never die away; God, only God, today and yesterday!

UNCONGENIAL. "I wish," quoth my friend the Business Woman, without looking up from the typewriter she was whacking, "that I had $50,000." "I'll give it to you," quoth I, "when I get my million." "I should worry and starve to death," composedly remarked my friend the Business Woman, as she ranked the finished letter out of the typewriter, "waiting for a million dollars. I'd be perfectly satisfied with $50,000."

"So would I," I murmured. "But why that exact sum?" "Because," she answered, "it wouldn't be too much. I'd hate to have so much money that it would bother me to keep track of it. I'd hate to have my money owing to me because they thought I was rich, and waiting for me to die to get some of my wealth. I'd hate to have to keep begging—nice fat ladies in silk dresses and beplumed hats who come in and sit down and take it for granted that you've got a million dollars to give them."

"I don't want to be rich," declared my friend the Business Woman. "I want only $50,000." "I'm satisfied," I muttered. "Invested in municipal bonds," she speculated, "$50,000 would bring me an annual income of about $2,500. That's enough to live on decently, and it would take care of my family, too." "Verily," I agreed. "You could have season grand opera tickets and belong to all the societies and have a lot of men trailing after me professing undying love for me, when I know they wouldn't look at anything in petticoats not lined with banknotes. I'd hate to have people saying nice things to me with their fingers crossed and telling others what they'd do if they were in my shoes.
