Always Ask the Price.

At a recent gathering of stage folks at an after-the-play supper the conversation drifted into reminis-cences of youth.

Miss Mae Collins, with "Believe Me," who plays at the Willmar Opera House next Tuesday evening Sept. 30, told the following experience and it was voted that she step to the head of the class.

"When about twelve, a girl friend of mine and I togged ourselves out in new outfits and put ourselves under public inspection at church on Easter Sunday morning. After services we determined to take dinner at the leading hotel, which had advertised a special Easter table d' hote dinner.

There had been no price mentioned in the advertisement and our experience in swell hotel dinners had not yet become very extensive. After we had enjoyed the dinner we asked the clerk the amount of our bill and he replied two dollars, one dollar each. You can imagine our Easter feathers falling when we discovered that we only had one dollar between us.

Of course we tendered this as part payment, promising the other dollar as soon as we could go home and get it. The proposition was refused. The proprietor was called and to him I offered my birthday present, a watch, as security, which he refused, evidently realizing that this was his only opportunity of getting even. So he demanded as payment in full that we go into the kitchen and wash the hotel dishes for one hour, which we did. If you can picture us in our dainty silk dresses washing dishes in that kitchen (by the way, have you ever been in a hotel kitchen?) then you can realize our humiliation.

The sight of that proprietor has many times been an incentive to commit murder but on my occasional visits to the old home I find that he still continues the hotel business unmolested and I often wonder how many others have learned from him the lesson, "Always ask the price," as I did. "Believe Me."
