AWAKENING OF THE CHILD.

There are still teachers who attach greater importance to the accumulation by their pupils of knowledge, of ton superficial and inaccurate, than to their ethical training, and a weakness in the present system of English primary education is its failure to give sufficient prominence to ideals of conduct. The expression, in the editorial columns of a journal ostensibly devoted to the interests of education, of the opinion that "If a headmaster talks generally about the duty of everybody to serve the community, his hearers will not apply the lesson to anything in particular," is evidence of what educational reformers have to face. The headmaster whom the writer appears to have in view has clearly mistaken his vocation, and it were better for him and the cause of education were he to transfer his activities to some other sphere. The assertion that the influence over English boys and girls of ideas which to them are wholly in the air, is problematical, begs the question. If ideals are presented to them as they should be, they will neither be wholly in the air nor will their influence be problematical. There is a doorway to the moral intuitions of every child, but unfortunately it is not given to every teacher, sometimes not even to the most highly trained teacher, to find the key which opens the door. The teacher that is needed is the one who, by width of view, breadth of sympathy power of inspiring those around him, can humanize his pupils and awaken in them not only an eagerness for knowledge, but a desire for right. Such teachers already exist, but more are wanted.—Christian Science Monitor.
