My Lady.

Thus do I dream Sometimes of a summer day, When the wind blows fresh from the hill, Cleansing our souls from thoughts of ill, As our limbs are washed by the mountain stream.

District Attorney Corkhill will lay before the Grand Jury all the facts obtained by him from Guitau respecting his crime, and an eye-witness of the assassination will appear before it and relate the story of that fatal Saturday morning.

It is based upon the assertion, "The deed was without malice, and malice is the essence of murder." In a brief, well-written argument, he supports his position with remarkable force. His associate counsel will probably dispel this pleasing illusion. He will be told that while his position may be correct in the abstract that in the concrete malice is presumed, and, therefore, nought but the commission of the act remains to be proved.
