The Story of Two Lovers.

Night in a great city. The wind surged and moaned with a mournful cadence through the leafless trees that stood like gaunt specters of the night.

A down a street where gleamed the bright lights of wine-bibbers' haunts and the baleful glare of the oyster saloon fell upon the sidewalk, a young man strode with quick, nervous step.

In the elegantly furnished parlor of a handsome residence a tall and radiantly beautiful girl sat silently in front of a grate fire, the flames from which leaped lightly up the chimney and cast a ruddy glow upon all that came within the range of their lambent beams.

"Which shall I choose?" said the girl in soft, melodious tones. Shall it be the strong-limbed Rupert with his proud Saxon pedigree, or Adelbert, who would deck his bride with jewels?

"Fate has brought you to me my darling," she said. "You must never leave me again."

After crossing the bridge Rupert did not slacken his pace, and was soon well toward the end of his journey, when the pitiful crying of a child attracted his attention.

By this time the bridge was closed, and the car was thrust on its way, the horses lashed into their best speed by the driver, who was anxious to make up for lost time.
