ALASKA COMMISSION.

It does not appear likely that there will be any immediate and practical results from the work of the Alaska commission, now in session in London. The result will depend largely, if not altogether, upon the British judge who is one of the commission. If he should unite with the Amer ican representatives to uphold the justice of our claim there would be an end of it. Otherwise there is no agreement in sight.

The three American commissioners went over with their minds already made up. It cannot be said that they are open to conviction. Every man of them is on record in the most positive terms in favor of the boundary as the United States claims it should run. They are not to be moved, and it would not be well
