THE STORY OF THE CATE.

Across the pathway, myrtle fringed,
Under the maple, it was hinged—
The little wooden gate;
'Twas there, within the quiet gloom,
When I had strolled with Nelly home,
I used to pause and wait.

Before I said to her good night,
Yet loth to leave the winsome sprite
Within the garden's pale;
And there, the gate between us two,
We'd linger, as all lovers do;
And lean upon the rail.

And face to face, eyes close to eyes,
Hands meeting hands in feigned surprise
After a stealthy quest—
So close I'd bend ere she'd retreat—
That I'd grow drunk on the sweet
Tuberose upon her breast.

We'd talk—in fitful style, I ween—
With many a meeting glance between
The tender words and low;
We'd whisper so dear, sweet conceits,
Some idle gossip we'd repeat;
And then I'd move to go.

"Good night," I'd say: "Good night—good night!"
"Good night!"—from her, with a half sigh—
"Good night!"—"Good night!"—And then—
And then I do not go, but stand—
Again lean on the railing, and—
Begin it all again!

Ah! that was many a day ago—
That I should stand there—although
The gate is standing yet;
A little crumpled, it may be,
A little weather worn—like me—
Who never can forget!

The happy—"End?" My cynic friend,
Pray say your sneers—there was no "end."
Watch yonder chubby thing!
That is our youngest, here, and mine;
See how he climbs his legs to twine
About the gate and swing.

LOVER AND EXECUTIONER.

How the Hand which Carressed Became the One to Kill—Lovers' Revels on the Earnings of the Scaffold—The King's Mistress—A Strumpet's Epitaph.

From the New York Dispatch.

At the end of the reign of Louis XIV., and under the regency in France, only doctors of the sorbonne were allowed to accompany culprits to the scaffold, but under Louis XV. and XVI. this custom was abandoned, and ecclesiastics were selected to extend the last offices of the church to condemned criminals. When Jean Baptist Sanson was executioner of Paris, the officiating priest at his executions was Dom Ange Modeste Gomarit of the order of the Recollets, Abbe of Epiques.

Father Gomarit was a kindly, thoughtful priest, who was reputed to have led a stormy life in youth. The result of one of its episodes existed in the form of a young girl whom he said was his niece, but who was actually his daughter. Her mother had been a dressmaker named Beau, who after her birth had married a clerk of the custom named Rancou de Vaubernier, in order to give

HER NAMELESS DAUGHTER A NAME.

Under the name of Jeanne de Vaubernier she was educated at the convent of Saint Anne, under the apparent care of her godfather, M. Billard de Monceau, but in reality under the protection of the worthy abbe, her real parent.

Education had produced no beneficial result on her mind. Her tastes were thoroughly mundane, and at her earnest entreaty she was apprenticed to a famous dressmaker named Labille. This change was the cause of her loss. In this situation, which enabled her to see every day the dances of the court and town, her country rapidly increased, and filled her with a wish to emulate the brilliant models she saw. Jeanne's beauty was remarkable, and there was no doubt that her success would be great if she could appear on a scene worthy of her charms. The girl fell a prey to her ambition. Without her father being able to prevent her, she began to lead a life of sin and dissipation. This was well known to her father. He did not speak openly of her dissolute habits, but he alluded to her with bitterness, and he constantly deplored the privilege of fatal beauty, which was the chief cause of her loss.

"She is the child of sin," he said, "I fear she feels the influence of her birth."

The person to whom the Abbe Gomarit spoke most about his wayward child was the executioner, with whom he had struck up quite a friendship, and at whose table he was a frequent guest. The headman's son and successor, Charles Henri Sanson, was then in the full strength and exuberance of youth. His imagination was heated by the priest's description of his niece, and he felt a burning wish to make the acquaintance of a girl so beautiful, and so invested with the charm of romantic wilfulness. He learned from her father that she lived in the Rue de Bac.

He was not long in learning to know her by sight, and soon became a well-known lounge about the street in which she lived. She, of course, noticed this, and while he one day stood pensively contemplating her window, her maid accosted him, saying: "My mistress has noticed, M. le Chevalier, that you have been following her as if you wish to speak to her. She sends me to ask what it may be?"

"That," returned Sanson, slipping a gold-piece into the soubrette's hand, "I can tell you."

"Mademoiselle can be seen," replied the maid. "She is alone and can receive whoever she wishes. Under what name shall I announce M. le Chevalier?"

"My name is of no importance as your mistress has never heard it. Still as I have no reason to conceal it, you may announce the Chevalier de Longval."

Thus, under the name of the ancestor who had first adopted the horrible trade to which he was destined, the disguised son of the executioner met the sweetheart who was to leave him to become the mistress of a king.

The liaison between the pair was a passionate and long one, but it ended with Jeanne de Vaubernier tiring of her lover and seeking a new one. Up to the time they parted she had no suspicion that he was other than a young country gentleman of means, for he spent lavishly the money earned by his father in his craft of blood.

The years which rolled the French monarch on to its doom sped easily and swiftly with the executioner of Paris. Baptiste Sanson, grown too old to wield his sword, passed that grim legacy on to his son. The lover of Jeanne Vaubernier became executioner in his turn. The mistress who abandoned him became the favorite of the king.

Madame Dubarry ruled right royally while Louis XV. lived. When the end came in the small-pox chamber at Versailles she vanished into as royal obscurity, with millions squeezed from a famishing people to be given to her. She had long forgotten her name of the Rue du Bac, and when she became Louis XV.'s favorite, Charles Henri Sanson had long lost sight of her. The Abbe Gomarit had ceased to speak of his daughter. She had vainly attempted to conceal from him her erratic existence. When she became a royal mistress she remembered her father, and thought, no doubt, that he would readily make the most of her equivocal elevation. Important personages went to see Gomarit, and offered him a bishopric; but all in vain. The old priest was not to be allured by the decline of every offer, and, the end of his life, he remained in his pious retreat, which he only left to discharge his functions and sit down once a week at the EXECUTIONER'S TABLE.

With the French Revolution to whose creation she had contributed her share, the vengeance fate had in store for her descended on the old mistress of headman and monarch. Arrested by the revolutionists she was brought to trial and promptly sentenced. The treasures she had accumulated were seized and confiscated, and she was handed over to the executioner.

The executioner was Charles Henri Sanson. The hand that had once caressed her was destined to deal the deathblow. It was destined, moreover, to record her death. The story of it, translated from his diary, we give below:

"Frimarie 17.—Madame Dubarry was sentenced to death last night, and executed this morning. We arrived at the hall of justice punctually at nine, but we had to wait, as the convict was with Citizen Denizot, judge, and Citizen Royer, who were taking down her confession.

At 10 o'clock Citizen Vandevy ver, who were three in number—the father and two sons—all accomplices of Madame Dubarry, and Citizen Bonardot and Joseph Bruniot, forgers, were brought in. While the above named were being arraigned, Madame Dubarry came in; her legs could hardly carry her. Her features had become coarse. When she saw me she shrieked, covered her eyes with her hands, and sank down on her knees, crying: 'do not kill me!' She arose to her feet again.

"Where are the judges?" she exclaimed. "I have not confessed everything; I want to see them!"

"Citizens Denizot and Royer were talking with two or three deputies who wished to see the poor woman; they came forward and told her to speak out. She said she had concealed several objects of value in her country house at Luciennes, but she sobbed and broke down at every word. Citizen Royer, who held the pen, kept on saying, 'Is that all?' and tried to make her sign the protes verbal, but she pushed the paper away, saying that she had something to add. She perhaps thought that, in reason of the immense wealth she was giving up, she might be reprieved. At length citizens Denizot and Royer rose, and said she must submit to the decision of her judges, and make up by her courage for the enormity of her past life.

"One of my assistants approached and attempted to cut her hair, but she offered resistance, and the other assistants had great difficulty in binding her hands. She at last submitted, but she cried as I never saw a woman cry before. As many people crowded the quays as when the queen and the Girondins were executed. Many cries were raised, but her shrieks were louder than any. She said, 'Good citizens, free me! I am innocent; I am of the people, good citizens. Do not let them kill me!' No one was moved, but men and women hung their heads, and silence prevailed at the sight of her suffering.

"Next day was gillotined Jean Baptiste Nael, deputy of Des Vosges; outlawed. On the way to execution he spoke of Madame Dubarry, and asked Sanson if the knife had been well cleaned.

"It has," replied the headman, "but why do you ask?"

"Because it would be disgraceful for the blood of a republican to mingle with that of a prostitute."

The headman's ex-harlot found a fitting epitaph in the contemptuous words of her fellow victim.

A Turkish "At Home."

From the New York Herald.

When a Turk has disposed of his visitors he goes into his harem to dine or breakfast, first removing his baba-chas. This custom of removing one's shoes before entering a room is not a religious superstition, but comes of the necessity for keeping carpets clean, seeing that they fulfill the purpose of chairs, tables, sofas, in other countries. The ladies' room may be furnished like Parisian boudoirs; but custom is stronger than fashion, and the Turks of both sexes like to recline or sit cross-legged on the floor. Their carpets are unusually soft and thick, and the carpets over the doors shut out all draughts and noises. Through the open windows that look out on the garden come a scent of roses and the hum of bees, mingled with the laughter of the children, who are playing on a well trimmed lawn, under the eyes of the dark-eyed Circassian nurses. The mistress of the harem—the Buik-Hanum (great lady), to give her her full title—dresses much like an English lady nowadays, reads French novels and plays the piano, though she dons upon state occasions, such as the chivalas, when she entertains other ladies. Chivala means a cake, but has come to designate a party at which that dainty is eaten, just as we say tea for tea-party in England. When a Turkish lady gives a chivala her husband is excluded while the strange women are in the house. These guests begin to arrive towards 6, accompanied by their maid-servants and negroes carrying lanterns and bringing their children with them. Closely veiled, they divest themselves of their burnouses and baba-chas in an ante-room, and put on delicate slippers, which they have brought with them in bags. The reception rooms are brilliantly lighted up with pink wax candles, and scented with fragrant pastilles. There is no kissing or hand-shaking between the hostess and her guests; but each lady, as she comes in, lifts her hand gracefully to her heart, her lips and her brow, which means "I am devoted to you with heart, mouth and mind." This mode of salutation, when smilingly performed, is very pretty. The greetings being ended, the company seat themselves on chairs if there be any Frank ladies present; if not, they betake themselves to the divans and carpets, and the cake-eating begins.

From the Harrisburg (Pa.) Independent.

For five years, says Mr. J. Echter, this city, I have been afflicted with rheumatism, and for two years have had a sore on my leg the size of a silver dollar, which nothing would heal. St. Jacobs Oil cured the rheumatism and healed the sore.

Andrew Johnson's estate will net over $100,000 or more. The widow of Andrew Johnson, Jr., has a suit against the administrator and the heir which is going to the Tennessee supreme court for settlement. One interesting question to be decided is the character of some cotton mill property—whether real or personal.

Such is the term Mr. C. W. Purcell, of the National Stock Yards, Chicago, Ill., applies to his sufferings. He says: I for one, wish to speak a word of praise for St. Jacobs Oil. I suffered with a pain in my shoulder and arm for some six months and at times it was terrible. One bottle of St. Jacobs Oil, however, cured me thoroughly.

"I thought it was cheap when I bought it," said Jay Gould in his testimony explaining the philosophy of his transactions, "and when I thought it was pretty dear I sold it." It is very simple,—buy on the dump and sell on the jump. That is all there is of it.

Why She Married.

Nature's Pictures by the Duchess of Newcastle.

Though I did dread marriage, and shunned men's companies as much as I could, yet I could not, nor had not, the power to refuse him—by reason my affections were fixed on him, and he was the only person I ever was in love with. Neither was I ashamed to own it, but gloried therein; for it was not amorous love, I never was in love with; it is a disease or a Passion, or both, I only know by relation, not by experience; neither could I have loved, power, or person entice me to love; but my love was honest and honorable, being placed upon merit, which affection joy'd at the fame of his worth, pleased with delight in his wit, proud of the respects he used to me, and triumphed in the affections he professed for me, which affections he hath confirmed to me by a deed of time, sealed by constancy, and assigned by an unalterable decree of his promise, which makes me happy in despite of fortune's frowns. For though misfortunes may and do often dissolve base, wild, loose, and ungrounded affections, yet she hath no power of those that are united either by merit, justice, gratitude, duty, fidelity, or the like; and though my lord hath lost his estate and banished out of his country for his loyalty to his king and country, yet neither despised poverty nor pinching necessity could make him break the bonds of friendship, nor weaken his loyal duty to his king and country.

What a Blind Woman Has Done.

London (Vt.) Herald.

A notable old lady is Mrs. Lawrence, of Craftsbury. She is 71 years old, and for six years past has been totally blind. During the past two years, nevertheless, she has spun, doubled, twisted, and knit 1,400 knots of yarn, making everything from a man's cap to a syrup strainer. One of these years she has taken care of the butter of ten cows, with the assistance of a girl ten years old, and also assisted about the cooking and general housework. She has never but once during these years made a mistake, at that time falling from the piazza to the road, breaking one wrist and spraining one ankle, from which injury she has never fully recovered.
