ROBLEY MALE QUARTET.

People who travel extensively, as do the Robley Male Quartet, have many amusing experiences.

When the Robleys were in San Jose, California, a friend of theirs sat in the audience next an old couple who were obviously enjoying the show. When Mr. Bayard T. Robley gave a humorous reading the old man, unable to control himself further, burst forth into loud haw haws. His scandalized wife dug him in the ribs, but with no effect. "Pa," she whispered loudly, "Pa, shut up, what will people think?" The old man calmed down for a moment, but another sally of Robley's started him off again, louder than ever. "Haw haw haw," he bellowed, "I can't help, honey—and I ain't trying to, anyway, everybody's doin' it."

One day Bayard and Richard Robley went for a tramp out through the piney woods and palmettos in Northern Florida, and happened upon a chain-gang—some twenty negroes and two white men. The whites showed a realization of their disgrace, but the care-free negroes sang happily as they worked and petitioned each passerby for money. A fat, contented looking negro prisoner, said to Bayard Robley, "Cap'n, won't you gib me a nickel to buy some smokin'?" The money not being forthcoming, he turned to Dick, who is shorter than his brother and with an irresistible grin said, "L'it Cap'n, Ah knows youse gwine heed my reqwes."
